pleted arrangements to go on an overseas entertainment tour, and was to leave from the east coast. She made a date to see Captain Meredith, while there.

That date turned out to be even more interesting than she had imagined it could be. They talked about books they had both read, about the new music, about art. "By the way," Captain Meredith said offhandedly, "I picked up something the other day I thought you would like. Sort of big, but I'll have it packed and shipped to Hollywood."

It was a cànvas by Covarrubias, one of the big three of Mexican painting. (Rivera, Covarrubias and Montenegro.) Paulette was overwhelmed. "But how did you know exactly what I would like? How did you know what would fit perfectly into my house?"

"Your letters are pretty clear. You have great descriptive powers.," Burgess said. Later in the evening he gave her copious advice about how to take care of herself while overseas. He mentioned certain ways he had learned to be as comfortable as possible.

Paulette grinned at him. "You're fussing over me," she said.

Burgess wagged his head. "When a man has asked a girl to marry him as often as I've asked you, he begins to have a proprietary feeling, I guess," he explained.

"Going to ask me again?" the lady teased.

"I'll wait to see if you're as good-looking when you get back from this tour as you are now," he laughed.

So she went overseas and the newspapers began to carry glowing accounts of Miss Goddard's trouping. One dazzled correspondent observed that she slogged through mud and performed in rain, but still managed to be glamorous and beautiful. Captain Meredith cut that one out and sent it to Paulete with the marginal notation that he was encouraged.

And then, after a delay for hospitalization due to complete exhaustion, Paulette was back in New York. She telephoned Burgess the instant she arrived. "I'll be right over," he said.

"Wait for an hour," sighed the traveler. "I'm going to get into a beautiful white bathtub, in beautiful hot water, with plenty of beautiful bubble bath—and I'm going to sit there and look at the beautiful big bath towels for at least an hour."

Eventually, this beautiful bath taken, Paulette joined Burgess for dinner.

"I'm going to be hungry all the rest of my life," she announced. "The army gave me the best it had—but oh boy, am I hungry!" They had a steak. And broccoli with Hollandaise Sauce. And potatoes (possibly from Paulette's farm) au gratin. She gazed admiringly at the filet mignon, then lifted her eyes to Burgess' face. "I'm trying to make up my mind which looks best to me: a bathtub, a steak, or your funny face," she wisecracked. Then she looked down quickly to deny the momentary hot surge of tears. She had seen, remember, a great deal: men in mud, men in rain, men beneath the blistering sun, men always lonely. Men in hospitals aware of pain, and men beyond the touch of pain. Human tenderness and the unguarded warmth of a man's eyes had become very important to her.

"Tomorrow I have to start telephoning wives and mothers and sweethearts of men who gave me their addresses and telephone numbers while I was over," she said. "Want to help?"

So the next day they set to work. Paulette had over five hundred women to call in the New York area alone. Burgess handled the notebook in which the information was written. He would call out a number, Paulette would dial, then explain her call. "Are you the mother of Corporal Pat O'Malley?" she would ask. Sometimes the affirmative quivered in quick apprehension, so Paulette always explained hurriedly, "He's alive and well. This is Paulette Goddard, and Pat asked me to tell you . . ."

Burgess, sitting a few feet away, was an intimate part of this sentimental drama. When the mother or wife who had received the message suddenly burst into tears, Paulette's eyes swam, too. And Captain Meredith, sensing the reaction on the other end of the wire, swallowed hard.

Sometimes the person who answered the telephone, and was told that Miss Goddard was calling, simply couldn't believe it.

It took almost three weeks of fairly steady work to finish the list. When the task was done, Paulette and Burgess went shopping. She had returned to New York with just one item of outer clothing—her uniform. Starting out with six dresses (some Hattie Carnegie models, some Valentina), she had given all of them away.

One day Burgess pointed to a bit of finery with the remark, "That would be nice for a trousseau, wouldn't it?"

Paulette smiled into his eyes. "Yes," she said. Perhaps that wasn't all that was said between them—after all, that is their secret. But when Paulette left New York, it was with the knowledge that, on May 21, 1944, she was to become Mrs. Burgess Meredith.

For the five o'clock ceremony performed in the garden of the David O. Selznicks' home, Paulette wore a long, empire-style dress of natural linen. About the neck and the sleeves were bands of gold embroidery that she'd purchased in Palestine. Her slippers were matching natural linen. In her hair she wore a flat gold chain, and on her left arm she wore a bracelet to match. Her ring (the single ring ceremony was used) was a circlet of diamonds with two outer bands of rubies.

Mrs. Alta Goddard (the bride's mother), wore a striking Hattie Carnegie suit that Paulette brought her from New York. The background was black, and upon this were embroidered sequin plums. She wore a large black hat.

Mrs. David Selznick was matron of honor and Mr. Lewis Milestone was best man. Chaplain Capt. O. Stanley Brown, U.S. Army Air Force, made the man-and-wife pronouncement, and the wedding party guests (only truly intimate friends) were Mrs. Lewis Milestone, Mr. Selznick and the Selznick children.

Captain and Mrs. Meredith have settled down in the home formerly occupied by Miss Paulette Goddard. They took no time for a honeymoon because the bride had agreed, in the week following her wedding, to do three radio shows for the army.

And so this story ends, as all love stories should . . . "They lived happily ever after."

BRINGING UP BABY

know why. I expect them to do it."

Dennis believes a child should find his goal in life early. He didn't, and feels he wasted much precious time floundering around trying this and that. He was resolved to help his sons decide early and give them the kind of education necessary to further the ambition. Already, Stanley has confided that he wants to be a pianist. Dennis is giving him piano lessons. "Maybe Stanley won't be a musician," says Dennis, "but he may as well be given the chance to find out."

Brenda Marshall agrees with Dennis' premise there, but sagely remarks that you never know how long a child's enthusiasm will last. Her six-year-old daughter, Virginia, also expressed an interest in music. But Brenda rented a piano for her daughter's lessons. If, after a reasonable time, Virginia continues her interest and shows aptitude, Brenda will buy her a piano; if she loses interest and doesn't keep up her practicing, the piano will be returned and lessons discontinued.

Education in music isn't Brenda's only child problem, for she has a three-months-old son, Peter, who seems a determined young man. He tries all the baby tricks, demanding constant attention.

"But after I've examined him to see if he has any reason for crying, I go away and let him scream like mad, until he stops of his own accord," Brenda comments. "I simply will not have a spoiled child on my hands!"

The brunette star has been amazed at meeting young children in Hollywood who are very rude and bad-tempered. She thinks a disagreeable child is no ornament to any home. Virginia has very pretty manners, and Peter will learn to acquire them—or else!

In Ruth Hussey's eyes, the most important thing any parent can give her child is a sense of stability and security in the home. What Ruth remembers most about her own childhood is the feeling that her family was there whenever she needed them. Thus she had confidence in herself; the knowledge of their affectionate support banished nervousness and fear. This is what she most wants for her child.

Everyone must be disciplined until he learns to discipline himself, is Ingrid Bergman's conviction.

"Whenever my daughter Pia does something wrong, I punish her for it. But first we talk it over and I make sure she knows why she is being punished. I seldom have to worry about her making the same mistake."

Dana Andrews' chief idea is that children should be self-reliant. "My daughter Kathy is eighteen months old. She has been taught to dress herself, feed herself and wait on herself as much as possible. She recently went to a child's birthday party where she was the youngest guest and the only one present who could feed herself," he boasts with proper parental pride.

When Kathy falls down or collides with some object, her parents pay no attention, and the baby has learned to take bruises in her stride. One day at Jack Oakie's, Kathy was playing around the swimming pool when she tripped over something and came down with such a whack it seemed she must have cracked her head open on the cement. Dana and his wife held themselves firmly back. Kathy lay stunned for a moment, then raised her head, looked around inquiringly, shook herself a bit and went on playing. It was a terrible temptation to run to her and see if she was hurt, but the Andrews never make a fuss and their daughter doesn't expect it.

"She gets things for herself, if they are within her reach, and every day she learns to do something new. It's much harder to teach a baby to do things for herself. It's easier to do it for her. But in the end, both child and parent benefit," Dana believes.

Gail Russell and Diana Lynn, young co-stars of "Our Hearts Were Young and Gay" asked D. W. Griffith the $64 question when all three turned out for Phil Baker's CBS broadcast from Hollywood Canteen.

Alice Faye agrees with Dana about teaching a child self-reliance, and thinks a child should be disciplined but not inhibited. She never says, "don't" without explaining why not, never threatens a punishment without carrying it through.

"As I've said before, I hope Alice junior will grow up to be an actress, but I certainly shan't force her," asserts the blonde star. "However, it seems she's a born mimic—she can take off both her father and me, perfectly. It got so that Alice junior insisted on taking over the mike when Phil began to rehearse his numbers at home. In the beginning, we thought that very funny. But presently the baby took the center of the stage, as a matter of course. Now Phil shuts her out of the room. I explain that Daddy is working and daughter must be quiet, that when we have free time we'll be happy to listen to Alice junior, not now. She wasn't very happy about this at first, but now she seems to understand and to have absorbed the lesson of give and take."

As of April 26th of this year, Alice Jr. has a small sister, Phyllis. Their mother confides that she will follow the same rules with her younger daughter that she has so far used for the elder one. "I think it is a little soon to know whether or not Phyllis will be the zestful, talented little person that Alice junior is," she says thoughtfully. "I may find that she needs greater encouragement, and if so I'll try to give it to her.

"The great difficulty in many families is to keep hands off in children's quarrels. I hope I'll have sense enough to let my daughters work out things for themselves and settle their own differences, once they've passed the kindergarten stage. I would like them to be companions, not rivals. I emphatically don't want one girl to be the star of the family, and the other the satellite."

Progressive education is highly favored by the John Garfields. Daughter Kathryn, now five and a half, has attended progressive nursery school since she was two.

"We'll continue our children's education in public schools rather than in private ones," says John. "We want them to associate with all kinds of children so that adjustment to different individuals will come naturally.

"Kathryn goes to bed at 7:30 P.M. David Patton, the boy, is in bed much earlier. We play with the children as much as possible. We believe you have to work with a child. It's more difficult for them to grasp reasons for doing or not doing things than it is for us. We never order Kathryn about, but we don't give her too much freedom.

"We don't make an issue of things. If Kathryn breaks a treasured bowl, she explains how it happened. She likes us well enough not to deliberately destroy something we prize, and we understand that accidents can happen. She is distressed that she has hurt us and never repeats the mistake that caused the accident.

"When we build our home after the war, we'll plan it so that the children can play safely in every room. We don't believe in isolating them. Kathryn has always been permitted to come and go as she pleases, whether we have company or not. She behaves excellently, never interrupting or distracting us. I believe the baby will do the same."

Military education is strongly favored by Don Ameche, whose two older boys are in military school.

"My sons are learning to be obedient, self-reliant, resourceful and capable," he points out. "If the boys in the present war had all had military training, things would have been much easier for them. I think at least a year of military training should be given every boy after the war—not that we expect to take on the enemy again, but for the advantage of being prepared.

"I want my four sons to grow up normal, average American kids, not pampered darlings. At home, they all have chores. Each chore rates a certain pay—the harder it is, the more money, and the longer time it takes, the higher the rate. Instead of allowances, the boys get only what they earn, and are free to save it, spend it or waste it, thus learning about money first-hand."

Frances Neal Heflin will follow the system devised by her mother, in bringing up tiny Vanna Gay. Frances was never spanked. They had an honor system whereby if Frances behaved well, she was rewarded, if she misbehaved, she was deprived of something she coveted.

"Van and I agree that a child should learn early to make his own decisions, so we hope to allow Vanna Gay freedom of choice whenever possible. She'll choose her own schools, college and career, and insofar as we are able, we'll help her. Therefore, it's up to us to teach her to make wise decisions and learn how to weigh arguments for and against each choice."

"You can't raise kids by books," is Jane Wyatt's conclusion. Before their first son was born, Jane and her husband tried to be very modern and even went so far as to take lessons in psychology. Chris was permitted to "express himself" according to progressive ideas. Presently, Chris was running the house and no one else had room for self-expression. They reverted to old-fashioned rules, entailing obedience, good manners, discipine and respect for the rights of others.

"We realize we don't know the answers to many problems of child-raising," admits Jane, "and we can only hope to meet each one as it comes along. Chris is mad about classical music and we have given him an album of recordings to which he listens by the hour. We encourage this and will see that he follows up his musical interest, if it continues. We think it is wise to educate the boys as specialists in something, giving them at least one special line to follow. But we also think they should have a general background of all-round education so that they will be well-informed."

Penny Singleton declares that war has made work essential for everyone, so every child should be educated to know how to work. Her daughter, Diji, is learning to cook and sew. She keeps her own room neat, puts away her clothes and makes all small repairs on them. When she's older, she'll choose a profession, trade or career and be trained for it so that she'll have tools at hand, if necessity demands.

Right now, Diji and Penny spend some part of each day together, reading and listening to radio programs. They follow the current news and have great maps of battle-fronts on the wall, marked with tiny flags they have made themselves, one for each warring nation. As troops move, Diji replaces flags to indicate the movement wherever it may be made.

Michele Morgan has every reason to be happy, for it's not just being out dancing with her husband, Bill Marshall—it's having him home again, medically discharged from the Air Corps.

"Diji keeps a file of recipes, too, and cuts out new ones from magazines. Some of the simpler ones, she tries out herself," says Penny. "But these are things anyone can think of. I'm prouder of the fact that Diji and I are good friends, that she knows I have confidence in her and she has confidence in me. When she was tiny I began to tell her secrets, and keep it up now. Diji is delighted that I tell her some things first and trust her to keep them until I give her word. She wants to be worthy of trust. And she is."

Rita Hayworth, commenting as a mother-to-be, says she's found her own childhood training a great disadvantage. Born a Cansino, she was brought up according to the strict Latin tradition, which she complains is no fitting preparation for a girl who has to live in her own generation.

"Being so repressed," Rita says, "I had a difficult adjustment to make. It gave me an inferiority complex, almost killed all my initiative."

So if her child is a daughter, you may be sure she'll be placed under no such handicap. Not so protected, perhaps, and not so many chaperones—but modernly self-reliant, free of troublesome complexes, at ease in her own contemporary society.

And that, it would seem, is the sum-total aim of nearly all these Hollywood parents. Not that their children should be spoiled by special advantages, but that they should be normal, well-adjusted future citizens—and that it's the parents' responsibility to prepare them as such.

The METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S LION'S ROAR

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

We made lots of promises about what to expect in this year of grace and the Number Twenty anniversary of M-G-M.

★ ★ ★ ★

One of the promises was "The White Cliffs of Dover". And from the success and the opinions, guess we've a right to say—promise fulfilled.

★ ★ ★ ★

Another—and what another!—is the forthcoming "Dragon Seed".

★ ★ ★ ★

You'll see "Dragon Seed" on the billboards. You'll see "Dragon Seed" on the express trucks. You'll read about "Dragon Seed" in your newspapers. You'll hear about "Dragon Seed" on the "M-G-M Screen Test" radio program.

★ ★ ★ ★

And all the shouting will be about something that deserves the shouting.

★ ★ ★ ★

Pearl Buck's best-seller is the story. M-G-M, you may recall, is the producer of her "Good Earth". But "Dragon Seed" makes this former remarkable production pale into whatever things pale into.

★ ★ ★ ★

Mask of Katharine Hepburn by famed W. T. Benda

Katharine Hepburn as "Jade" gives one of the outstanding performances of this or any year.

★ ★ ★ ★

But others—Walter Huston in particular—Aline MacMahon, Akim Tamiroff, Henry Travers—are right up there. As is the splendid direction of Jack Conway and Harry Bucquet.

★ ★ ★ ★

Pandro Berman produced. Misses Roberts and Murfin did the screen play. It's all a wonderful package.

★ ★ ★ ★

This tremendously dramatic, unquestionably tender personal narrative stands in the foreground of China's magnificent resistance to inhuman aggression.

★ ★ ★ ★

Other publications are calling "Dragon Seed" the Picture of the Month. Certainly that. It is really the Picture of the Year.

★ ★ ★ ★

HAPPILY MARRIEDS

Even in April, 1944, Alexis Smith and her fiance, Craig Stevens, told their friends (including writers, because everyone likes this pair very much) that they had made no wedding plans. They had met three years earlier when they worked together in an Errol Flynn opus titled "Dive Bomber," and promptly fell in love. A year after this meeting they announced their engagement. Then the delays began.

Craig joined up and went off to camp. Because of painful recurrence of old athletic-event injuries, he was given a medical discharge from the army. Even then, the pair agreed, they couldn't marry. For one thing they couldn't find a house in the length and breadth of Burbank, Glendale, Hollywood, Beverly Hills or Rabbit Burrow Gardens. Lackadaisically, they placed their names on some of the waiting lists, but they were usually forty-ninth in line so they didn't give their chances much hope.

Then one morning Craig answered the telephone, to be informed by a Beverly Hills apartment house manager that his name was next on the list.

Result, on June 18, a radiant Alexis Smith marched down the center aisle of The Church of the Recessional in Forest Lawn Memorial Park, on the arm of her father, Mr. Alexander Smith.

So now Craig and Alexis have practically everything their hearts could desire: love, marriage, good parts in the forthcoming "Hollywood Canteen" and a charming home. Everything, that is, except a telephone.

CALL IT A PROPHECY?

Many weeks before June 6, Jean Pierre Aumont had made correspondence arrangements with a Hollywood florist to have dozens of roses delivered to Maria Montez on the morning of the sixth, to celebrate her birthday. In thanking him, Maria cabled that June 6—D-Day—was a date to be remembered forever by all the world, whereas previously it had been important only to them. And she added that, because Jean Pierre is French, it would be grand if Paris could be liberated as a long-distance wedding anniversary celebration on July 13. The French as a nation, she concluded, would probably find July 14 more to their liking.

JIVE ARRIVAL

As practically everyone knows, Miss Phyllis Harris arrived at St. John's Hospital, Santa Monica, California, on April 26, weighing eight pounds.

Alice, Jr. had been told some weeks before that the stork was planning to leave a baby at her house, and she promptly decided it would be a little brother. The reason for this assumption was simple: she can say "brother," but she can't manage all the sibilants in "sister."

When the new baby was brought home and installed in the crib in Alice's nursery, where that young lady sleeps in a twin bed, she looked over the newcomer with ill-concealed delight. "My brother!" she observed to the nurse, beaming fatuously.

"No," corrected the nurse gently. "This is your baby sister, Phyllis. Your mother and daddy are going to call her Phyl."

"Oh," said Alice, Jr. wagging her curly head. She toddled out to the play room, laid hold of her miniature piano on rollers, and shoved it into the nursery. While the baby was enjoying its bottle, the elder Miss Harris played with one finger and sang, "Pop Goes The Weasel."

RUSH—BLUSH—HUSH!

When Kay Kyser and Georgia Carroll eloped to Las Vegas, they intended to keep their marriage a secret for a few months. Great was their chagrin when they were tagged for speeding (they were exceeding the limit by only a few scant miles per hour), because they were convinced that the officers would give them away. However, the cops—the soul of gallantry—agreed, not only to keep the secret, but even offered to make hotel reservations for the newlyweds under an assumed name so that hush-hush could be maintained.

The following day Kay and Georgia returned to Los Angeles. He went to his apartment and she went to hers. They were secure in their feeling of having outwitted the town. The next morning they were each awakened, in their separate living quarters, by the telephone calls of reporters who had been hepped to the situation by some mysterious, unidentified informant. BLUE NOTE IN JIVE

When Donald O'Connor and Gwen Carter were married in Tia Juana, the nuptial ring was a dime store band, secured in the haste of the moment. However, Don had ordered a matching ring to wear with Gwen's diamond, several weeks before the trip to Tia Juana. In time for Gwen's commencement day activities, the custom-made ring, resplendent with twenty small diamonds, was delivered. This made her the utter, super envy of practically (Continued on page 58)

DINAH SHORE

Their Favorite Tunes

DINAH SHORE was rehearsing for a broadcast on Eddie Cantor's program at NBC when we talked to her. Her dark eyes smoldered when I asked her what her favorite song was.

"'Blues in the Night' is a favorite of mine for no reason I can put my finger on," Dinah said, "but 'Stars Fell on Alabama' is the song which brings back to me the most potent of memories.

"During my first year at Vanderbilt College, I got a chance to make my first appearance on a radio program—over station WLAC in Nashville. I was going to sing 'Stars Fell on Alabama' but I didn't get around to learning the words.

"That night was also the occasion for a first date with a fellow who was a year ahead of me at school. I had decided to make notes of the words of the song and sing from them, but he said, no, that I wouldn't make a good impression that way. So, for the entire trip to the station he had me repeating the song until I knew 'Stars Fell on Alabama' perfectly.

"From then on we were pals. After school we went our separate ways. A few years passed. He joined the Naval Air Corps.

"One day I received a letter from him, telling me he expected to get a furlough shortly, and would I save a date for him? He wrote that he heard my broadcasts from where he was stationed, so I planned to sing 'Stars Fell on Alabama', knowing he'd recognize the tune and know it was my way of saying 'yes.'

"Two days before the program went on the air, I received a wire from his mother. He had been killed at Pearl Harbor.

"And so I didn't sing 'Stars Fell on Alabama' that night. I never have since."

MR. SKEFFINGTON (Warner Bros.)
Bette Davis once more gives an excellent character portrayal, devoting all her boundless energy to a difficult role.

It is difficult because of its sameness; a woman who thinks of no one and nothing but herself, from the time she's a young belle of the town until she is old and unloved. Miss Davis has excelled as unpleasant women many times before this, but always heretofore they have afforded an opportunity to display a variety of moods. In "Skeffington," the heroine is frivolous and thoughtless in every scene. Special mention, however, should be made of Miss Davis' voice, controlled throughout this picture so as to be utterly devoid of emotion, and never varying from its light, metallic clink.

The film revolves around Fanny Trellis, orphaned debutante, who continues to live with her brother in a well-equipped mansion, even after the family fortune has dwindled away to mere memory. The brother swindles money from his wealthy employer, Job Skeffington. When Fanny discovers his plight, she marries Skeffington to protect her brother, and to gain access to the Skeffington bank account.

Throughout their married life, particularly after her brother is killed in the World War, Fanny ignores her patient and adoring husband and travels in her own group of socially prominent men friends. Divorce comes years later, and Skeffington goes to Germany, where eventually he is interned in a German concentration camp. Fanny contracts an illness which takes away her preserved beauty, leaving her old and haggard. In no other respect, though, is she changed—even after the forcefully dramatic scene which is the finale.

Claude Rains, as the "mister" in the story, gives a dignified interpretation, sensitive, and not without humor. Walter Abel, Richard Waring, Marjorie Riordan and Jerome Cowan support the principals.

THE GREAT MOMENT (Paramount)
Preston Sturges, noted for productions streamlined with riotous comedy, makes a departure in "Great Moment," proving his versatility.

The story deals with Dr. Morton, a dentist one hundred years ago who discovered anesthesia and gave it to the world, thereby freeing from pain his own generation and those to come. The story of Dr. Morton is interesting, not only because of the usual tribulations of a scientist seeking the answer to a problem, but also because he was not recognized as the benefactor of humanity that he was. After experimenting with ethers and finally learning to control the time element, he works doggedly to prove that his discovery can triumph over pain in the operating room. The "great moment" comes when he sacrifices all personal gain to give his discovery to the world. He died in poverty, unrecognized for his labors.

Joel McCrea gives a convincing performance as Morton, Betty Field is responsible for the frothy romance in his life, and William Demarest is fine comedy relief as the doctor's guinea pig.

The film is well done, interesting as well as educational, and is particularly timely during these months when so many of our men overseas are being wounded and benefiting from the work of this unsung hero.

GUIDE

MINSTREL MAN (PRC) is Benny Fields' introduction to the screen, after thirty-five years in vaudeville.

As Dixie Boy Johnson, greatest blackface artist of all time, Fields plays a mourning husband. His wife dies, in giving birth to their daughter, and Fields leaves show-business, later to be reported dead. Having been aboard the Morro Castle, he's among the missing and it's assumed that he went down with the ship.

Friends bring up the child, who follows in her father's stage footsteps.

Fine direction, artful camera work and considered casting with catchy songs put over in the inimitable Fields style, make it a musical that rates being called "unusual." It's a touching story, with a quota of tears; a debut performance for Judy Clark (singer from "Meet the People"), and includes your old friends Gladys George, Roscoe Karns and Alan Dinehart.

MARINE RAIDERS (RKO-Radio) Another war picture, if you can take it. Robert Ryan plays a Captain and Pat O'Brien, his senior officer, on one of the Pacific islands. When they finish off one island and go to Australia for a rest, Ryan meets Ruth Hussey—and comes love.

They are on their way to be married when Ryan is injured in an air raid, and O'Brien, thinking the love angle is the bunk, has Ryan shipped back to the States.

This leaves the girl pining away, back in Australia, and promotes no love between the two men, as you can imagine! They are "stuck" for months training Marines at a U. S. base, then eventually get back into the battle. The marriage takes place, then the men leave once more on a big scale operation.

The acting is fine, and the story moves along at a fast clip.

UNIFORMED HITCH HIKING IN HOLLYWOOD

Bob Hope met one of those blase soldiers at his radio broadcast one night. He liked the boy and invited him home—then asked him to come to the studio to watch him work. The soldier said no. He didn't want to go to any studio lot, he explained. He knew exactly what would happen. The first movie actress he saw would throw her arms around his neck and exclaim: "Oh, isn't he cute!" to the rest of the actresses. Bob laughed at this. Motion picture actresses were just as blase as the soldier, said Mr. Hope. The soldier needn't fear.

So the boy went to the studio with Bob. When they got on the set, the first girl the soldier saw was Betty Hutton. She promptly threw her arms around the soldier's neck and yelled, "Ain't he cute!" to the rest of the gang.

The soldier turned and fled.

SHIRLEY COOK
BEAUTY EDITOR

YOUR Coiffure IS CONVERTIBLE

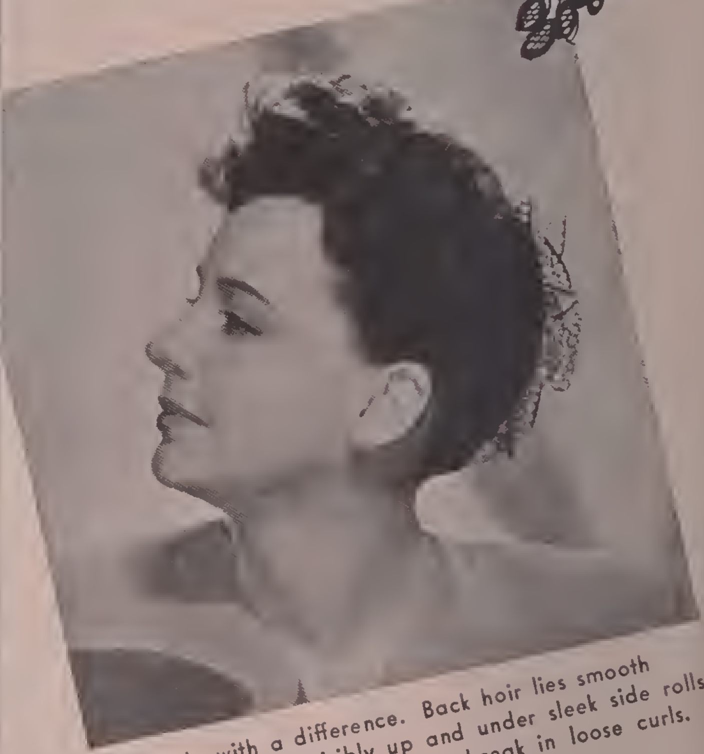
Formality without fripperies. That's Signe Hasso's formula for the perfect night time coiffure. Low on the nape in back, front hair swirled and swept up.



An up-do with a difference. Back hair lies smooth and flat, drawn invisibly up and under sleek side rolls. For frontal flattery, soft waves break in loose curls.

THE face you face the fall with needs a fitting frame. And it's not too soon to consider a change of coiffure. But what goes on, on your pretty head, needs careful consideration. Because this year, there's no rigid rule. It's all a matter of suit yourself, and suit yourself to the occasion.

That's why Signe Hasso, lovely Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer actress whom you'll see in "The Seventh Cross," takes to the convertible coiffure. The longer length back hair (about seven inches) goes up or down with equal ease. The shorter three-to-five-inch front can be worn in a froth of fluff or reversed in deep wide waves.

This is our idea, and Miss Hasso's, of a basic hairstyle for the girl with a view toward versatility.

Choosing a coiffure is only part of the picture. To make a hair-do work, your locks must have a look of lustrous luxuriance. And that, after a casual, carefree summer, is going to take some doing!

First, then, comes, conditioning. If you've never used a tonic, this is the time to begin. There are all types for all troubles, so linger over the label and find what's right for you. Then, several times a week, give yourself a "treatment."

Part the hair in inch sections and apply your tonic with fresh cotton squares. As you rub along each little part, dust and dandruff come away, leaving the scalp more flexible and, with a lubricating lotion, less dry.

Gentle massage and vigorous brushing come next—massage to stir up circulation, a bout with the brush for a prettier polish.

The healthiest hair is the very cleanest kind and weekly shampoo is the secret of more sheen. To be effective, it must be thorough. Two separate applications of shampoo are not too many; some people like to use three. However, if you choose any good cleanser that's specifically made for hair, and use it exactly according to directions, you can be sure it will remove every trace of dulling grime.

Your crisp clean curls will be easier to arrange if you use a light setting lotion; if you soften and subdue dry ends with a touch of pomade or brilliantine; if you anchor an upsweep with lacquer and invisible combs.

Finally, when your hair is back to its best and you've settled on the styling, you're ready for a fall permanent, the firm foundation for any convertible coiffure. This year, you'll probably consider a cold wave. And you'll probably find that its cool comfort results in the softest, strongest kind of curls.

Directed by HENRY KING

THE MOST IMPORTANT EVENT IN 50 YEARS OF MOTION PICTURE ENTERTAINMENT!

His first movie role was that of "Chicken", the kid marine who stole your heart in "Guadalcanal Diary".

Reluctant Richard, they call him—the boy who took plenty of persuading before agreeing to a film career. Having finished his second role, in "Wing and a Prayer", wherein he will charm you all over again, he joined the Merchant Marine. Dick won't say he'll come back to the screen after the war—insists on deciding that when the time comes.

Ellen (Joan's daughter) doesn't understand divorce.

Joan with citations from entertaining soldiers.

Now It Can Be Told

"YOU can't do this to us!" So said the letters which came in dozens to Joan Blondell when the end of her marriage to Dick Powell was announced.

For you see, the marriage of Joan and Dick was a symbol of ideal marriage. It was conceived in the public mind as something steadfast and lasting which could weather the storm of dual careers, and the shock of adulation, and the stress of living in a highly tense, emotional environment.

There were other sharp comments and admonitions. "It's only a spat. Don't take it seriously." "Think of your children." And by inference, that another man had usurped Dick in Joan's affections.

Because of these letters, this story which was not to be told, is given to you. Perhaps it is as well. The slate should be clear. For Joan, as a person, is entering a new, fresh life. Professionally, her picture career is sharply ascendant, with her role as Cissy in "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn," now in the making. The truth about her personal story may lessen disillusion, reduce that sense of bewilderment in the minds of all those who comfortably accepted the marriage of these two as nothing less than a perpetual idyll.

Joan knew shortly after her marriage to Dick that it was a mistake. Theirs were two wholly unlike personalities and temperaments. Their values, their attitudes, their reactions to people and situations were diametrically opposed. Small frictions grew into major differences.

Joan knew shortly after marriage that it was a mistake. Theirs were wholly unlike personalities and temperaments.

Refusing to follow the migration to Beverly Hills or San Fernando Valley, the Powells lived in a home just off Hollywood Boulevard.

Even Joan's sister Gloria (shown here when she visited the "Cry Havoc" set) had no idea how unhappy she was.

Time, Joan thought at first, would bring adjustment. Instead, it increased the gulf between them. But never once by word or gesture did she betray her confusion, her desperation, and her heartbreak. She read accounts of her perfect marriage in newspapers and magazines with a stifling, trapped feeling.

Her mirror reflected her unhappiness. When a woman is content in her marriage she is alive and vigorous and forceful. There is an aura about her. She is an individual and not a carbon copy of anyone—not even of her husband. In Joan, the spark flickered. She saw a stranger in the glass.

The years went on. Norman, who is nine now (Joan's son by a former marriage), grew from babyhood into sturdy boy self-reliance. Ellen arrived at the increasingly adorable stages of two and three and four. Joan was mad about the children. She lost herself in them, and tried to fill her life completely with them. Through them she sought compensation for whatever lack of unity there was in her marriage.

Whenever the word "divorce" entered Joan's mind, as it must have many times when their differences became more and more apparent, she violently tore herself away from the thought of such action.

But something was happening to Joan. Physically and mentally, as well as emotionally.

When her contract with Warner's was finished—that was in 1940—she was glad. That would give her more time at home. Perhaps if she gave her concentrated attention to making adjustments, perhaps if there was only one urgent career in the family, the gaps would close. They didn't.

Joan's health was beginning to suffer noticeably. That knot in her solar-plexus became a permanent resident. Her hands were not quite steady.

In 1942 she began a year-long Victory Committee tour. She entertained at army (Continued on page 85)

He's a comedian, he's a great romantic actor, he's a swell guy—but you sum it all up when you say . . .

There's Only One

Everybody has a good time on a Grant set, and you can see why.

CARY GRANT

Forever an Englishman! When it comes time for a spot of tea, Cary takes his in his dressing room—if he's working on a picture.

Scene from "None But the Lonely Heart." Cary's first chance to play with Ethel Barrymore, and Miss Barrymore's first picture in twelve years.

CARY GRANT was standing in the doorway of his dressing room at the studio, one morning not long ago. An electrician passed by.

"Hiya!" said Cary.

"Hiya!" said the electrician. Then he started on his way. All of a sudden he did the most beautiful doubletake you've ever seen.

"Hey . . . ! Wait a minute!" the electrician said. "You're not working today."

"Nope," said Cary.

"Then why the heck are you hanging around?" The electrician scratched his head.

"I like it here," Cary answered, with that voice that isn't still English, yet isn't quite American, and with a grin from here to there.

The electrician scratched his head again. Then he shook it and wandered on his way. Cary threw back his head and laughed.

So maybe he likes it here. So all right! Can't a guy be nuts about his work and not be nuts himself?

Do you want to know how a man behaves who's nuts about his work? All day long on the set, Cary's teeming with vitality, like a race horse champing at the bit. When the director calls him to go into a scene, he leaps onto the set, with his eyes shining, ready to act. In between shots he's everywhere, talking to everybody and deeply interested. You see what I mean? You don't? Well, come out to RKO with me and I'll show you.

You get past the gate man, if you're lucky, and wander up the studio street. You pass some Aussie soldiers, but that's another picture. You near the dog wagon where some technicians and actors are ordering hot dogs and cokes. Then suddenly you are almost hurtled off your feet by a figure zooming by on a bike. You are about to hurl back a few choice words, when the bike stops, a guy gets off, and the air is filled with apologies. So you grin. After all, the bike didn't really touch you, and you really weren't hurt, only startled. And after all, what can you do in the face of apologies from Cary Grant? Not with that grin staring in your puss!

Then off he goes down the street again, yelling back that there're shooting on stage fifteen and he'll be back in a second, after he makes a telephone all. By the time you've vaguely caught the last (Continued on page 64)

SINATRA'S LEADING LADY

Daughter of the Carter DeHavens, stage favorites of a generation ago, Gloria gives with the glamour.

BEFORE RKO studios started production on Frank Sinatra's starring picture, "Step Lively," they had a momentous problem. Who would be his feminine vis-a-vis?

They couldn't find the right girl for the lad with the glamorous tonsils. Practically every starlet in Hollywood was beating her brains out trying to get the part, and RKO was testing dozens of aspiring beauties in their search for a lass with looks, voice, personality and charm enough to share honors with "The Voice." It was beginning to look like another "Gone With The Wind" routine, when the studio master minds scratched their collective heads and came up with an unanimous decision and a "Why didn't we think of her before" expression—Gloria De Haven!

Gloria didn't come from any great distance—just across town from Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, where during the past year she has been rapidly climbing the star ladder. She jumped from a bandstand to one of the leading roles in "Best Foot Forward"—and, a seven-year contract! Her subsequent appearances in "As Thousands Cheer," "Broadway Rhythm," and "Two Girls And A Sailor" have proved that Gloria is not just another cutie with a voice and a figure. She can act, too!

Gloria's father, Carter De Haven, was well known in the theatre, and her mother was an actress; so she naturally inherited some talent. But her success is not an inheritance; it's a culmination of much hard work, lots of ambition, and many disappointments.

She was in a reminiscent mood the day we met for lunch at The Brown Derby, and as two girls will, we sat there long after the fashionable hour and just gabbed and gabbed. I have known Gloria for about two and a half years, having met her when we both tried out for the vocalist spot with Jan Savitt's orchestra. We still laugh about the fact that we auditioned with the same song, "Embraceable You."

"My heart sank when I heard you go into the tune, Jill, but I decided I'd do it too, because I had sung 'Embraceable' when I got my first band job with Bob Crosby, and it had sort of become my lucky song."

The charm worked. Gloria won out over all the other girls, and stayed with the Savitt band until she was signed by Metro.

"How did you happen to get into the music business, anyway?" I asked Frank Sinatra's new leading lady.

"It's a funny thing, but I never had any ambitions in that direction at all. I was sixteen years old and still going to high school, with a few months to go to graduation. I attended Mar-Ken, which is a private school for kids who work in pictures and radio. I only went half days, which left my afternoons free to make the rounds of the studios. At that time I wanted more than anything to get a contract. But the best I ever got were a few small bit parts, and most of the time I got nothing.

"My brother, Carter Jr., used to play golf all the time with Bob Crosby, and one night he took me out to the Trianon ballroom where Bob was playing. Bob came over to our table and Carter introduced us. Bob told us he was auditioning girl singers that night, and all of a sudden Carter said: 'Why don't you get up and sing a song, Sis?' I had never even been on a bandstand before, and the idea was frightening.

"But they teased me into it. So I went up and sang 'Embraceable You,' and I was scared to death. I received very mild applause and Bob smiled and said 'Thank you'. But before we left he told me to come to the radio station the next day. He wanted to hear me over the speaker system.

"Mother didn't think too much of the idea, but I went down and once more started 'Embraceable.' Bob was sitting in the booth, and before I was halfway through the song he waved his hand at me to stop. I felt simply sick, and was sure that I had done terribly; so home I went, terribly dejected. But about an hour later I got a phone call from Bob's manager, asking me to start with the band that night. I was just about the most excited girl in the world. At last, I had a job—even though it wasn't in front of a camera.

"I worked with Bob three months, and during that time I graduated from high school. Pictures were still uppermost in my mind, so when I finished with Crosby I tried once more to get a break at one of the studios. And once again, no luck."

How the talent scouts ever passed up Gloria, just on looks alone, is beyond me. She has a natural, fresh beauty which doesn't need false eyelashes or a lot of goo. Her hazel eyes and blonde hair are set off by one of those peaches and cream complexions. (Gloria has that "ivory look," if you know what I (Continued on page 72)

IF someone were to come up to you and ask: "What was the most important day in your life?" you'd probably have to stop and think a bit before answering. And the chances are ten to one that the day you'd select would be the last one any of your friends would have selected for you.

It's the same with movie stars. What's important to a person is purely a personal matter.

"The most important day in my life," Gene Tierney will tell you, "was the day I eloped to Las Vegas with Oleg Cassini.

"It was an exciting and romantic elopement. We wanted to keep it secret until after the ceremony, so we didn't use our real names when we bought the plane tickets. I used 'Belle Starr,' my character name in my new picture, and Oleg used an unpronounceable Russian name.

"It was fun, sitting across the aisle from each other, pretending we were strangers. Oleg was better at it than I was; I couldn't resist winking at him now and then. Once I caught the stewardess' disapproving eye on me. She definitely thought I was flirting!

"We would have gotten away with it too, if it hadn't

Years ago, Zachary Scott spent a typical holiday, not knowing that it was to be his discovery day.

Irene Dunne had to wait three weeks before she was certain which had been the most important day in her life.

Gene Tierney remembers the day when she traveled under an assumed name and was accused of flirting!

been for a taxi driver at the airport. When we descended from the plane, he rushed over and asked: 'Where to, Miss Tierney?' I was startled, but I tried to bluff it out. 'You're mistaken,' I told him, 'my name is Belle Starr.' 'Oh, no, it isn't,' he said, 'it's Gene Tierney. You see, my name's Tierney, too, so I follow you pretty closely. You can't fool me.' He pointed to Oleg, named him too. 'You're here to be married,' he said.

"So the news was out."

The day Claudette Colbert selects as the most important in her life had nothing to do with romance. Easter Sunday of last year—it was the day she went down to the Wilmington Shipyards of Consolidated Steel, to christen the U.S.S. Apling, a Naval combat transport.

"I was the first motion picture star ever to enter the shipyards," Claudette says proudly, "and the reason it meant so much to me was because being a star had nothing to do with it. I was honored that way because I'm a navy wife. My husband, Lieutenant Commander Joel Pressman, is a navy doctor. It was a wonderful feeling to get completely away from being a motion picture star, and for one day to be just a wife.

"I was nervous at first, but I soon overcame that by concentrating on the importance of what I was doing. It was one of the most thrilling days of my life."

For Janet Blair, it was Thanksgiving day of 1939. That was the day she met Lou Bush, now her husband.

To explain how it happened, we have to go back a bit, to when Janet was living with her family in Altoona, Pa.

The manager of Hal Kemp's band was a friend of the family. He had always promised Janet that some day she could sing with the band. When the band played her home town, shortly after her high school graduation, Janet tried to hold him to his promise. He urged her to wait a little while longer, said he would get her the chance.

Sure enough, she received a wire one day, telling her the band was in Pittsburgh, and she could come there and audition. It was Thanksgiving day.

"I rehearsed all day," Janet says, "so nervous I was sick. The boys invited me to join them at Thanksgiving dinner and I went along, but I was so sick I couldn't eat. They all tried to (Continued on page 74)

DANNY KAYE

BY SYLVIA FINE (MRS. DANNY KAYE)

As told to LUPTON A. WILKINSON

They lived across the street from each other, as kids. Were introduced years later by a shoe-string producer. Danny, odds-job boy; Sylvia, soup demonstrator.

Ace comedian of the Broadway stage, Danny Kaye made his screen debut in Samuel Goldwyn's "Up In Arms."

AT HOME If Ever

Rations problems, and how! Danny is erratic about his eating—either nothing at all, or Mexican enchiladas at three in the morning.

The boy from Brooklyn, and crazy about baseball. Danny Kaye likes all sports, but a back injury handicaps him as a participant.

IT'S been five and a half years since I met Danny Kaye.

There I was, a child prodigy, so help me, training to be "a great concert pianist." But having no money to finance such a career—even the preparation for it—I was demonstrating soup for $12.50 a week one winter, in a Brooklyn grocery store. Came a call from a then shoestring producer, saying he'd heard I "wrote songs," and would I come over and see if any of my numbers fitted into a revue he was throwing together. Would I!

There was a supple-and-snappy blond at the theater when I arrived—a boy giving a playing-all-the-roles performance for a show that almost didn't last till opening night. No funds, no money to put up for the city license "to give a public exhibition," so the cops came and closed the doors. That night, after dress rehearsal, Danny and I rushed around town rounding up the dough, discovered we'd lived across the street from each other as kids, and—well, I guess you know the rest.

We were married about a year later, flat broke; Danny hit the jack-pot in a New York night club (La Martinique), won national fame in a three-page part in the stage play, "Lady in the Dark," starred in another stage play, "Let's Face It," and there we were—trying to make good in mankind's maddest endeavor, a Goldwyn musical revue. ("Up in Arms" was the title. Remember?)

As you can see, for part of our lives together we were rehearsing in the morning, matineeing in the afternoon, giving an evening performance (Danny was, that is), and then night club work till 3 A.M. Home managed to rear its lovely head, but with difficulty. For I was busy, too—thinking up and helping to write skits, goofy numbers, and scat and jive songs for the versatile young man who's so fast he has a reputation for making speed seem old fashioned.

Realization of the speed with which everything has happened to Danny and me came during a recent conversation about that old subject—money.

"Danny," I opened, "I want to talk to you."

He ducked, but I went right on.

"We don't need this big house," I said.

"Oh," Danny muttered, "it's not so big Kinda nice."

"It's larger than two people need," I persisted. "We're going to hunt for a smaller one."

"All right," Danny agreed, cheerfully.

"Danny," I said, "do you know what rent we're paying?"

"No." He still sounded cheerful—and uninterested.

"Danny, have you heard about taxes?"

"Well, yes," he admitted.

I was winding up then for a general lecture, but Danny cut in. "Listen, honey, three or four years ago I was making fifty dollars a week. We got along fine. I can always make a living. When I'm eighty years old I can make fifty dollars a week, singing in a saloon, if I have to. Do what you want about the house, but if we're going to worry all the time about this money

DANNY KAYE AT HOME

Married four and a half years, the Kayes' career has been both business and matrimonial. Sylvia writes all Danny's material.

Danny's mother died when he was thirteen. He was a wandering boy, ran away to Florida once with a total capital of only twenty cents!

we're said to be making, I wish we were back to the fifty bucks. What does it mean? I was able to fix things so my Dad could quit work. That's swell. What else? When I earned one hundred dollars a year, I wore a suit. Now I wear a suit. What else can a guy wear but a suit?"

Danny flatly refuses, you see, to worry about money. Has no sense about it, whatever. As soon as we got into good income, in "Let's Face It," I made an agreement with him. We'd let our two salaries be paid in to our lawyer. We'd each draw an allowance of fifty dollars a week. I'd pay household expenses, except rent, and buy my clothes; he'd have his allowance to buy meals out, gas for the car, gifts for the "touch-boys" he can never refuse, and his clothes. Plenty for both of us, I thought. (And we live on that basis, now.)

But there was something wrong with the system I'd worked out. I soon found out that Danny thought signing checks didn't count. He'd take three or four fellows to lunch or dinner, and sign the check. The bill would go to the lawyer. He'd buy gas for his car, sign the check, and that bill would go to the lawyer. As for clothes, when Danny says, "All a guy can wear is a suit," he isn't kidding. He buys one outfit, wears it till it's almost shiny, then buys another. He'll never change that habit, any more than he'll substitute "prosperity" friends for his old buddies back in Brooklyn.

Yet he was always broke—not a nickel in his pocket come Saturday night. What was he doing with his money?

"Danny," I said, "I don't care what you do with your allowance. I don't want to know. But you should know. If you spend something for stamps, you should know it. If you buy a fancy necktie, you should know you've done it. You're broke all the time, yet you've no idea where your money has gone."

He'd just stand there, looking like a very good-natured puppy who's being scolded, and say, "I know, Hon, I know." Never any defense.

One day I came home, finding Danny there before me, and he said, "Hon, where have you been?"

"Oh," I said, a little wearily, "just batting around Greenwich Village with a girl friend, looking into antique places and old bookshops."

"What did you see?"

Enthusiasm conquered my basic worries, for the moment. "Danny," I told him, "I saw the most beautiful old fashioned garnet necklace. Really, it's beautiful!"

He turned on his heel without a word and went, light-footed, upstairs. When he returned he had an old pair of shoes in his hand. Taking the trees out of the shoes, he began to pull out fifty-dollar bills. "I've been saving this," he said, "to buy you something when I sort of found out something special you wanted. I guess this is it . . . this garnet necklace you saw today."

What would you do about a guy like that?

What people quarrel about is always fun to know, and really tears the veil—Salome's No. 7. In Danny's case there's one delightful feature: he never gets angry about anything important, but little things cause all that flexed coordination and energy of his to explode.

He can't stand to see things done wrong, or sloppily. If you say, "I don't know how to do this, but I'm going to try," he'll be patient. But if you start out with conceited complacency or nonchalance, and then it turns out you don't know what you're doing, heaven help the neighbors' ears.

The long distince record for a Danny-to-Sylvia yell was set over an event simple enough to seem silly: I pulled down a Venetian blind. All the way down. (You get very little training about Venetian blinds, in Brooklyn.) "Blank, blank, blank!" yelled Danny, who seldom swears. "When you don't know how to do something, why don't you ask someone to do it for you!"

I understand Danny pretty well now, and his tempers merely amuse me—though I hope I stay too smart to laugh while he's mad. (Continued on page 83)

A GIRL can look like a limp lean when she comes out of the water, her favorite hair-do sacrificed to the fun of the swim. Unless she's smart, like the ingenious Esther Williams, who knows a thing or three about solving the problem—and does. Magic for the mermaids, you can call it. A clever little trick, and all so easy—with the knowing how, as Esther demonstrates it.

MAKING YOURSELF A Sand Witch

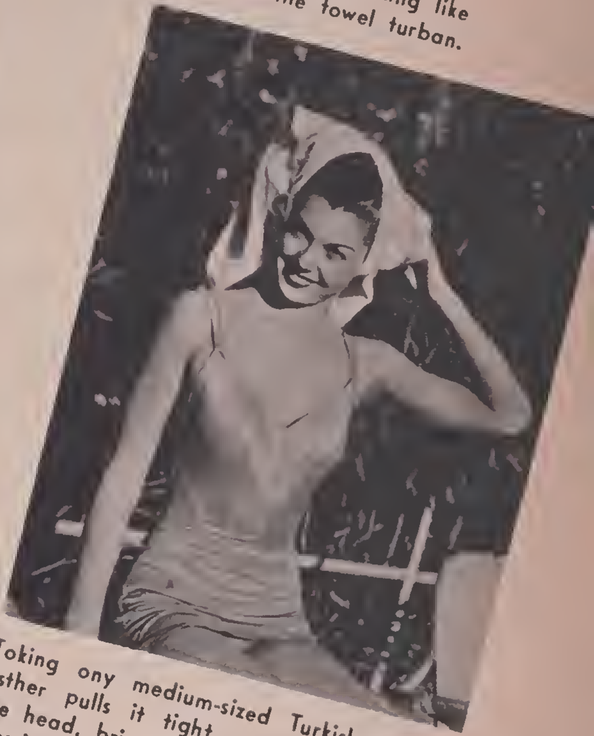
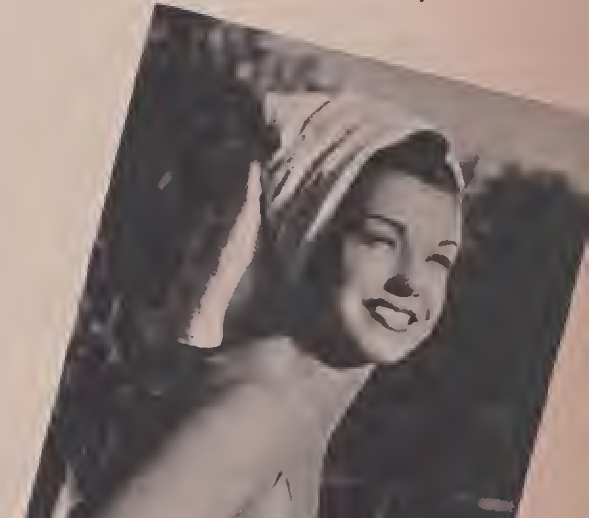
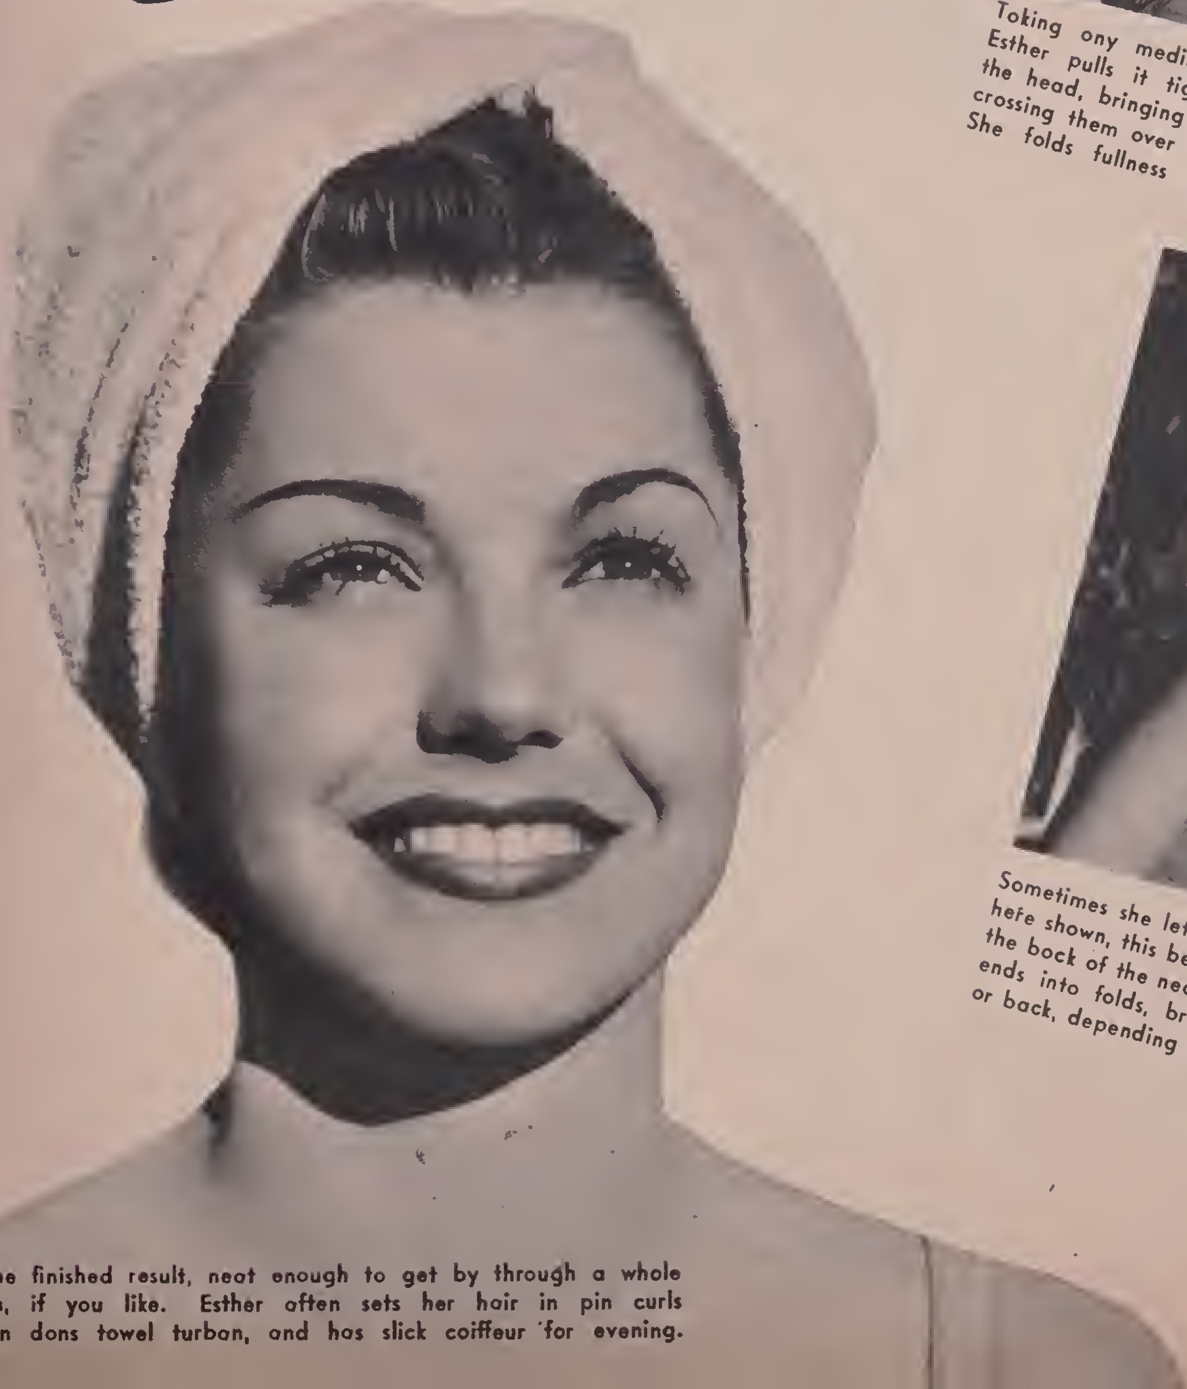
Now the co-star of "Bathing Beauty," beautiful Esther once was star of Billy Rose's Aquacade. As such she had her lovely tresses soaked two or three times a day. There wasn't time for hairdressing, but Esther wasn't going looking like a goon. She invented the towel turban.



Taking any medium-sized Turkish number, Esther pulls it tight across the back of the head, bringing the ends forward, then crossing them over the crown of the head. She folds fullness flat across the sides.



Sometimes she lets the ends hang down, as here shown, this being a good way to shade the back of the neck. Other times she tucks ends into folds, bringing the line forward or back, depending upon what is becoming.



Here's the finished result, neat enough to get by through a whole afternoon, if you like. Esther often sets her hair in pin curls first, then dons towel turban, and has slick coiffeur for evening.

Wedding of the Month

CAST as sweethearts in "Doughgirls," Alexis Smith and Craig Stevens became happily married in real life before starting their next picture ("Hollywood Canteen," Warner Bros.). Reverend Stuart P. MacLennan performed the ceremony; Mrs. Virginia Agnello, school friend of the bride, was matron of honor in the wedding party. Captain John E. Horton, from Kansas City, Missouri, served as best man for the happy bridegroom. There were no bridesmaids.

As late as last April, the couple told friends they anticipated a long engagement. The advancing of the wedding date had to do with their being able to find an apartment, which was more than they'd dared to hope, what with living conditions in Southern California being what they are in these twentieth century war times!

"GOOD ENTERTAINMENT IS INTERNATIONAL"

Living up to her name, "Character" Emerson demonstrates how not to dive if you want to avoid an all-points landing.

HERE COMES CHARACTER!

You've seen the face, but it's different every time you see it. Whether in the role of a native girl in "The Desert Song" or in "Between Two Worlds" with John Garfield (below) the girl movieland calls "Character" is in character.

By VIRGINIA KING

WHEN Ralph Waldo Emerson penned his immortal classic, "Essay On Character," little did he think that one hundred and forty years later his grand-niece would garnish the simple but powerful Hollywood title, "Character."

She is not just Faye or Miss Emerson; she's "Character." Directors and fellow players who have worked with her in many of her film successes hail her with:

"Here comes 'Character!' "

And rightly so.

One day she'll show up in pigtails and no make-up. Another day she's a sophisticated lady with long, drooping lashes and carefully painted lips. She may round a corner on the studio lot astride a messenger's bike, ki-yiing and hell-bent for election. Or she'll be the Grand Dame and inveigle a studio driver into taking her from one stage to the next in his big black limousine. She usually shows up in a shorts outfit and play sandals when she's to make portraits. But doggoned if she isn't rigged up like the first lady of the screen meeting the President, when she's assigned to make leg art. Day in and day out she's something new, something different.

At Warner Brothers studio they have cast her, among other things, as an axe killer, a slinky Nazi female spy, a gal gone wrong and a gal that has been wronged. She played the role of a native girl—plenty easy on the eyes—in "The Desert Song." She waited on tables in "The Hard Way" and was one tough dame that could take it as well as dish it out. She's been the charming wife who awaits the return of her submarine commander husband from his Tokyo destination. (And who wouldn't, when that guy is none other than Cary Grant!)

In "Mask of Dimitrios," Faye plays a double edged role—that of a good girl who winds up as a woman of few virtues. While in "Between Two Worlds" she reaches the heights of dramatic acting.

No wonder, then, that she has developed the habit of automatically autographing her photographs for her host of friends and fans as "Character" rather than just plain Faye.

"Character" was born Faye Margaret Emerson, in the little deep-south town of Elizabeth, Louisiana.

Just as she reached the toddling age, her parents trotted her off to Chicago. And then in rapid succession the Emersons moved to El Paso, to Beaumont, and then on to Houston. Tiring of the Lone-Star state, the nomadic family trekked next to Torreon, New Mexico, later to Carlsbad. From there they wandered to San Diego, and thence to Hollywood.

In all of these various states Faye attended the public schools. She wound up her scholastic efforts at Point Loma school near San Diego, and at the San Diego State College.

"My brightest moment in my hop-skip-and-a-jump days of schooling," she recalls, "was being selected by the senior class in high school as the most vivacious freshman. That, for some unknown reason (maybe because I was showing evidence then of being a character), gave me the enviable role of the school cheer leader."

In college Faye grabbed off another honor. She became the school's song leader.

As for acting experience gained from her schooling, however, it may be told in one terse sentence of two words. "Yell leader." It left her, she explains, with a "good strong voice, emphasis on the strong." Funny thing, though, if "Character" is being interviewed in the studio Green Room (where the Stars and Press lunch on the Warner cuff), her voice is so softly modulated that she is suspected of being shy.

In commenting on the start of her acting career, Faye pays high tribute to (Continued on page 87)

LIGHTS, CAMERA, ACTION!

BEHIND THE SCENES of every motion-picture are the hundred and one invaluable people who contribute their talents, knowledge and immeasurable experience toward making that picture a success.

Some of them get screen credit, most of them don't. They are that large and for the most part unknown family, each contributing importantly to your movie entertainment, each with a part to play, and all working toward that one goal: the saving of temper, time and money. Neglect of any of the three can cause havoc.

You think of a movie as being the star, the story, the director and the producer who brought them all together. You forget the assistant director. It's his job to maintain complete coordination throughout the set, while a picture's in production. Arriving before the director, he sees that everything is in place, knows every extra by his first name, helps in the casting of the minor characters, and often handles units of his own.

By ELEANOR HARRIS

IT ALL happened quite unexpectedly, as so many Hollywood events do. The audience settled itself, half-curious, half-belligerent, to see Director Alfred Hitchcock's new picture, "Lifeboat," starring Tallulah Bankhead. Shortly after the film began to unreel, a tall, brown young man with a big mouth, a white grin and a terrific torso became noticeably present in the story. By the time the picture was half over, the feminine half of the audience was obviously gasping every time he appeared on the screen. And by the time the picture was finished, a new male star had been born. For those women came stumbling out of the theater dreamy-eyed, with a thousand questions to ask.

"Who is this John Hodiak? Where did he come from? What's he like?"

You women had discovered what Hollywood hadn't suspected—that John Hodiak is potential box-office dynamite. It goes under the heading "Sex Appeal." You can count on five fingers the male stars who have it, beginning with Gable; because it almost never happens. There are plenty of attractive men on the screen, and "cute" ones, and interesting ones. But those with that "certain something" are rare gems, indeed.

So—presto! Mr. Hodiak shook hands with stardom, thanks to you women. Thanks to you, after a Hollywood past full of bit parts in "Stranger in Town," "I Dood It," and "Song of Russia," he is now playing the lead opposite Lana Turner in "Marriage is a Private Affair." Thanks to you, John is a coming star of gigantic magnitude.

But you still don't know anything about him, do you?

John is a tall young man with green-yellow eyes, dark brown hair, and a wide mouth set above a square chin. When he's standing still, he supports his six-foot length on spread-eagled legs, with his feet gripping the floor. He has long, sensitive fingers and a deep voice—and he carries with him an air of simplicity and sincerity. You'd be willing to leave any problem to him, sure that he'd solve it. He wears casual sports clothes, but dresses conservatively. He wears shoes that are shoes, not a few leather straps in search of a sole. And his skin has the healthy glow that (Continued on page 69)

BARBARA BRITTON

UP until now, this has been a very exacting year for Miss Britton. Uranus, which brings its gifts in devious and unusual ways, has squared her Natal Uranus and Natal Mars until the middle of June. This alone would create many trying and difficult situations, which she could have met more easily had not Saturn, the planet which says 'you may not pass until perfect,' also squared her Natal Sun, Natal Saturn and Natal Jupiter.

This is enough to bring bewilderment and discouragement to the most even of dispositions. But Barbara just gritted her teeth and worked twice as hard and kept her own counsel. It has been a round of hard work, denial and nervous strain. Relief is in sight, though, after the middle of August, when Saturn releases its influence and she can carry out more fully the plans laid through the last of June and during July.

If proper rest and relaxation were not taken, there was some added confusion during the latter part of July, possibly engendered by a natural wish to make that bank account grow a little faster. By August the vision is clearer, for she knows that anything begun must be finished, and that all gain does not show in a dollar sign. The gain she knows is hers is mental—having progressed greatly in her understanding of people and situations.

September might find a bit of retrenching, only to make the more secure that advancement which has come because of her sincerity and a sudden and beneficial turn of affairs. October is a time for caution, since the tension of the previous months has now relaxed, and she will be wise to avoid all criticism which might follow from motives of envy. It is a time to tie up all loose ends and, while being as generous as her heart prompts, to guard against loss. A splendid role appears in November, with financial gain.

Barbara Britton has such a steady head that she will not allow social obligations to interfere with business, and she will ride the crest of the wave on an even keel, secure in the knowledge that she has truly earned her success through hard work and sincerity of purpose. Barbara Britton is well aware that success in the difficult profession she has chosen does not come easily. Her intelligence also tells her that once gained, success is an elusive possession. With these facts in mind, Barbara can be counted on to take all necessary precautions to secure the continuance of the present course of her life. Through hard work and sincerity of purpose Barbara's future is assured.

Virgo for those persons born between August 24 and September 23.

UP until the summer months, this may have been one of the most difficult years you have known. But those Virgo people who have had the courage to accept added responsibilities, the patience to solve puzzling conditions and the wisdom to refrain from being overcritical or overworrisome, have won through to big things.

If you did not rush things or allow resentment to cloud your usual good judgment, legal and marital affairs should have settled themselves for the better by July.

The public has an eye on your talents, and even if the money seems plentifully rolling in, use that natural caution. Budget yourself and those dependent on you. Be especially wary of schemes guaranteeing you can become a millionaire overnight. Things come in twos this year, so even as you stand to double your resources, you can, by mismanagement, lose twice what you could afford to.

Because of social or financial difference of opinion, romance may be hard to understand. An old romance could ripen into real love. If married, allow your partner the liberties you yourself expect, and take. Make all decisions privately, with a canny consideration of the future, preparing for better times—for 1944 is a critical year, the watchword for which seems to be "double or nothing."

Discovered in "Journey for Margaret," starred as little Alpha in "Last Angel." They call her the child Sara Bernhardt.

HER name is Margaret O'Brien. A little girl of seven, already getting star billing, and already being described in Hollywood as "the hottest name on the MGM lot."

And she can right well take care of her interests against any and all comers, too—including such cinematic giants as the gifted Charles Laughton!

Making a picture with a child isn't easy. Assigned to "The Canterville Ghost" with little Margaret, the veteran Mr. Laughton might naturally have been expected to apply the deepest resources of a cunning mind to the problem of how best to filch a scene from a fellow player. On the contrary, she won him completely.

It all began during the first weeks of shooting. Her being a child limits Margaret's working to four hours a day. And when free of the camera, she made it a practice to hurry to her dressing room and there to engage in one of the accepted hobbies of the great: she dallies with art.

Having finished what she considered a good drawing, Margaret presented it as a gift to Mr. Laughton. The next day she gave him a second, and the following day, a third. Mr. Laughton had been very much amused by the first sketch, but by the time he had received three he became seriously interested. He is keeping the drawings because he believes that, as some child psychologists would be quick to agree, the key to Margaret's remarkable histrionic ability may be hidden in her art work.

She likes crayola, but she would rather use paint. As paint is likely to be tough on costumes, her work on the set is confined to non-runny materials. Her technique is early-kindergarten, with a "Lady In The Dark" influence—as she nearly always manages to insert a dream sequence with angels in the upper right hand corner of her works. She has a great fondness for architectural drawings, specializing in houses with one door, two windows and violently smoking chimney. Picket fences to keep her fantasies on the proper pages are another O'Brien tour de force.

But there is one genuinely remarkable thing about the drawings: Margaret's characters have expressive faces. It is normal for a child of her age to insert round eyes, a line nose, and a choice of straight or half-moon mouth, into the oval face of any figure. Margaret is not content with that. She sometimes looks at herself in the mirror, lifts her eyebrows and ovals her mouth, then transfers the expression to the character she has drawn. She scowls, and her drawings get straight eyebrows, fierce little eyes, and dagger mouths.

One morning Laughton arrived on the set carrying an important package, and presented it, with great formality, to Miss O'Brien. Like any little girl, she set to with a whoop and tore the wrappings from an antique Polish statuette of the Virgin Mary. "Oh, Mr. Laughton," she sighed, "it's so beautiful. I'll make you a drawing every single day."

On another occasion, Margaret was answering questions directed by two newspaper women who were visiting the set. She was getting on glibly, as she obviously sees no difference between her mother's friends and her own contemporaries. Everyone is a proper person, and Margaret loves people. It is as simple as that. While she was chatting, Mr. Laughton was striding back and forth in the background—not exactly eavesdropping, you understand, but fascinated by Margaret's poise, and eager to be a non-participating witness.

Without pausing in her conversation, and without turning her head, Margaret extended a small hand upward and backward in an affectionate gesture. Mr. Laughton took the chubby paw, thereby being drawn into the circle. This presented a problem in social usage which Margaret perceived and prepared to handle. She couldn't remember the names of the two visitors, but she passed over this with aplomb. "You know Mr. Laughton, of course," she said. "He is the ghost in this picture. He goes around scaring people."

During one scene in the picture, Margaret was supposed to say to the ghost, explaining the action of some callous earthlings who had chased the poor cowardly ghost up a chimney, "But they wouldn't have done anything to you, if you hadn't tried to frighten them."

This is an awkward bit of dialogue, as any adult will discover after saying it over several times. Margaret was having trouble with the intonations. The director wanted her to accent the second you and the final word, them. She tried, but she wasn't getting it. Finally they gave up rehearsing and decided to shoot the scene. Margaret was obviously concentrating very hard on the sentence, mulling it over to get the sense of the thing. When she spoke the words, the sequence had been changed in her analytical young mind. She said, "But if you hadn't tried to frighten them, they wouldn't have done anything to you."

That makes more graceful sense than the way the dialogue was written, which proves that being an actress involves a good deal more than parroting lines. However, the scene was cut, and the camera rolled on a second take. That time Margaret repeated the lines as they were originally written, laying stress on the proper words. She had worked it out her own way, and that done, was capable of giving it back to the mike in any form desired.

So much for her remarkability, which cannot be denied.

In the main, however, she is a perfectly normal little girl who is fortunate in having a sensible and sensitive mother. Margaret's father died four months before she was born, so she has been the entire emotional focus of her mother's existence since that time. Were Mrs. O'Brien not the calm and intelligent woman that she is, and had she not previously reared her younger sister, this fact might have created a serious "silver chord" situation. However, Mrs. O'Brien views her amazing offspring with deep affection, amusement, and frequent astonishment.

Your Problem and Mine

BY Bonita Granville

Do you have a problem? Are you in need of advice? Tell your story to Bonita Granville, addressed in care of Movieland Magazine, 9126 Sunset Blvd., Los Angeles 46, California

Dear Bonita:

I read in MOVIELAND about your helping out with people's problems, so I thought I'd write you about ours. I know it isn't so very important, but I thought you could tell us the solution.

I am fourteen and a freshman in high school. We all hate the fact that there is so much juvenile delinquency going on, so we are trying to fix up a place where all of the kids can go evenings so that they can keep out of trouble.

We know that a lot of kids will tell their parents they are coming to the club, just so they can get out of the house. Then they will get into trouble. We might get blamed for it and our club would be closed. Our teachers won't back us until we have all the problems solved for the future.

Could you suggest a suitable name for the club? It will be for all San Bernardino High School students.

Thank you very much for your expected kindness.

Sincerely,
Arta Mae

Dear Arta Mae:

On the contrary, I think your problem is VERY important, and you and your friends are to be commended for the wonderful idea you have, and your understanding of the juvenile problem of today.

Why not have the boys and girls sign a sort of register when they come into the club, and at that time give them a small card which is dated and bears the name of your club. A rubber stamp can be obtained for this purpose I am sure, and that way your problem would be solved, and at the same time this procedure would add a little more dignity to your club.

Good luck to you all, and keep me posted with your progress.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Miss Granville:

My problem is a hard one to write about. But I need some advice so badly, and I think you can help me.

I was a victim of infantile paralysis when very young, and it left me lame in one leg. I am seventeen years old now, and my great ambition is to be a concert singer. I want to do this more than anything else in the world, but I feel that my physical handicap will stand in my way.

Do you think this is true, and that I should abandon the idea once and for all?

Please help me,
Helen

Dear Helen:

First of all, may I compliment you on your courageous and common-sense attitude about your handicap? Whatever you do, I am sure you will succeed because of this and the fact that you do not think of yourself as a martyr or a person with two strikes against her.

As to your ambition, I most assuredly would not let this defect stand in my way. By no means allow this to deter you from your goal. Remember that many of our greatest artists are handicapped, and far more than you. Two great examples are Marjorie Lawrence, the operatic star, and Connee Boswell, the popular singer.

Good luck, and keep up the fine spirit.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Bonita:

It took a great deal of courage to write this letter, because I have never talked to anyone about my problem . . . but I feel I can discuss it with you.

You see, although I am 22, I am very short, just about as short as is possible and still be in the Army. All my life I have been kidded about this, but I have always pretended that I could joke about it. Now, though, it is hard to joke about it, when I can't get a girl friend, and people laugh at me.

Can you suggest any way I can overcome this?

Thank you in advance.

Yours truly,
George

Dear George:

If you are a jolly sort of person with the right mental outlook on life, and a good companion, people will overlook your height.

Remember that the fact that you are short is far more important to you than to others, and as such it is greatly exaggerated in your own mind. Physical appearance is no indication of character, and if ever that were true it is now. You are fortunate to be a member of the United States Army, and perhaps if you take more interest in what goes on around you, and laugh a little more, your problem may solve itself.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Miss Granville:

I wonder if you can help me? I am only fifteen, but I have been an invalid most of my life. Recently I developed an

Life Without Father

AN OPEN LETTER TO SAM WOOD FROM HIS DAUGHTER

K. T. Stevens

DEAR DAD:

Since my twenty-fourth birthday is coming up shortly, I've decided it's high time I vanquished a few ghosts that have been haunting me. And the biggest one is you! For years now, people have been saying, "That girl's career is a cinch—any daughter of Director Sam Wood's has it plenty soft. After all, isn't he one of Hollywood's top directors—didn't he do 'For Whom the Bell Tolls,' 'Saratoga Trunk,' 'King's Row,' 'The Devil and Miss Jones,' and any other picture you can think of? Why, his daughter could get acting jobs if she were two-headed!"

Well, Daddy, you haven't been any more help to me than if you'd been Mr. Grocery Store or Mr. Automobile Salesman. Your being Mr. Director didn't add anything at all to my career. Oh, you helped me immeasurably with your interest, dear; and with the money you slipped me during my threadbare periods. But Mr. Grocery Store would have done as much. Do you see what I mean?

So on with my battle cry of freedom.

I always wanted to act, ever since the day Mother took me on one of your sets when I was just a tiny baby. I kept on wanting it, all through Los Angeles High School. And when I graduated—a sixteen-year-old gawky creature, with straight hair strained into a knot and big spectacles—I remember I said to you, "Now I will act!" Then do you remember what you said? You said, "Not in the movies you won't; you need too much training!"

It was then that my first secret hope that you'd throw me an acting life-line vanished. It was also then that I first began brewing what was to be my only Family Revolt . . . and that wasn't due to you at all! It was Mother. If you recall, she wanted me to be a social butterfly—I guess because she had been one herself, and because you came from a pretty snooty family in Philadelphia, years ago. She pictured me as drifting from tea-party to dinner-party in long fluffy dresses, being a debutante to end all debutantes. But I had other plans. I enjoyed reading, or going to a movie alone, more than any party ever given—and I still do! I was determined to be an actress. Yes, determined!

I went to the University of Southern California for one year, acting; then to Neely Dickson and the Bliss-Hayden Dramatic Schools for another (Continued on page 67)

BY NINA NICOL

Smiley Burnette

ACCORDING to the Motion Picture Poll, he's America's Number Two Cowboy. But you've never seen him wearing a ninety-dollar shirt slashed with embroidery, tottering about in elaborately embellished boots, and pants seven sizes too tight.

You've come to know Smiley Burnette as the friendly face grinning over an accordion, or cuddling a banjo while he sings twangy cowboy ballads in a smooth, whimsical voice. You know him as the big guy who's always the lovable comic, stringing along with the handsome hero—and the handsome hero's horse.

But after ten years with Republic Studios—years as second lead and being the funny man with his best friend, Gene Autry—get ready, you lovers of Hitching Post Hoss Opera, to welcome him in his new role. For here comes our newest Western star—our oldest cowboy friend—Smiley Burnette.

He's rated today as the highest salaried star on the Republic lot—and all because he loves to see people laugh. He started making them laugh when he sold hotdogs on the campus of the University of Illinois, as a sixteen-year-old kid in his hometown. He clowned and sang to his customers, and they forgot that his name was Lester Alvin Burnette and christened him "Smiley."

When the second oldest radio station in the United States (WDZ) opened in Tuscola, Illinois, they needed a janitor and handyman. Smiley went to work, broom in one hand and window-washing bucket in the other. He loved it—and kept right on smiling and singing and making people like him. And it wasn't long before he was station manager, announcing and filling in whenever necessary, and his salary raised to the fabulous sum of $12.50 a week.

One night he was called to the telephone for a long distance call from Chicago. "This is Gene Autry," came the voice at the other end of the wire. "I want you to come to Chicago to be on the WLS Barn Dance."

Smiley laughed. "If you're Gene Autry," he said, "I'm Annie Laurie! I'm going to call Gene Autry and check."

Which is exactly what he did. The same voice answered, asking him how much he was making at WDZ. "Twelve bucks-fifty a week," Smiley said proudly. "And it's there every week, like clockwork!"

"I'll raise it to thirty-five a week," Autry told him, "and it will be there also like clockwork."

Smiley gasped, and yelled into the phone: "Look around, pal—that fat boy standing in the doorway will be me!"

For three years on the WLS Barn Dance in Chicago, Smiley was Gene's right-hand man. He endeared himself to a public wanting cowboy music. He gave it to them—the cowboy musician who plays more than fifty instruments, and still can't read a note of music. Asked how he learned to play, he just shrugs and grins and says, "Oh, I shoved my older sister off the piano stool when I was four, and just sorta picked it up."

He never found time to "learn" music—never needed to. All the same, he can write it. Smiley writes all the songs used in his pictures—over three hundred of them, to date, with several published song books thrown in for good measure. Among what he's written are such favorites as "Mamma Don't 'Low No Music Playin' Here," "Riding Down (Continued on page 66)

His mother and father were both ministers of the gospel. Smiley, at the moment, is playing stand-in for a horse. Any resemblance to Blackeyed Nellie is only a coincidence.

Being a hillbilly comic is only one of his jobs. Smiley's also a handy man with tools, spends hours in his workshop making toys for his own kiddies and tots in the orphanage he helps support.

WELL, Kiddies, it doesn't seem possible, but I've been throwing "Words of Music" at you for a whole year. It's been wonderful fun and I hope you've enjoyed it as much as I have. Your letters have been swell and I've loved receiving them. Your suggestions and ideas have been a real help in putting the column together each month. I won't bore you, being sentimental about the whole thing. I'll just say a big "thank you," throw a ribbon on the typewriter, and get going.

THE TUNEFILMS: "Bathing Beauty" (formerly titled "Mr. Co-Ed") is another one of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's super-extravaganzas, this time in technicolor. The picture stars Red Skelton, now Private Skelton of the Army, and for the first time you'll see him in a semi-serious role. Not that there aren't plenty of laughs. The film is full of exciting stuff—Harry James and Xavier Cugat and their bands; Ethel Smith, the "Hit Parade" organist; and a lavish water ballet with Esther Williams, the swimming star, and dozens of mermaids. In the tonsil department we have Carlos Ramirez, Helen Forrest and Lina Romay. Helen sings "I Cried For You" as only she can, and Lina cavorts with the Cugat band. Incidentally, it was her appearance in this picture that landed Lina a long term contract with Metro. She has been given the lead in a forthcoming rhythm flicker, "The Kissing Bandit." (They can do better than that for a title).

Marion Hutton, who has been appearing in theatres and clubs since the Glenn Miller band broke up, has been signed by Universal. After her debut in "Babes On Swing Street," she was given the romantic lead in "Abbott and Costello in Society." I wonder how long it will be before someone gets the bright idea of putting Marion into a picture with sister Betty.

Martha Tilton, who, for my money, is one of the best of the girl singers, finally got a swell break as an actress. She has the lead in "Swing Hostess," which will be released by P. R. C. When she finished the picture, Martha went overseas with the Jack Benny troupe.

Over on the Twentieth Century-Fox lot everyone is raving about the new team of Dick Haymes and June Haver in "When Irish Eyes Are Smiling." After seeing them together, Darryl Zanuck ordered two weeks of additional scenes on the picture.

Paramount has signed five bands for their forthcoming musical revue, "Out Of This World." Ray Noble, Henry King, Ted Fio Rito, Carmen Cavallero, and Joe Reichman. The boys will be featured in a piano number in addition to appearing with their orchestras. Paramount also grabbed Stan Kenton and his band for "Duffy's Tavern."

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC:

Before telling you about the records—just a reminder. Some of them will have already been released in your community and others you may not be able to purchase for a few weeks. Because of the terrific labor shortage, factory difficulties and transportation problems, it is not possible for the recording companies to adhere strictly to schedule, as they did before the war. So don't get hysterical if you can't get a record the very minute you want it.

COLUMBIA:

First off we have an album by Count Basie—"Blues By Basie." Eight sides of the (Continued on page 76)

CHRISTMAS HOLIDAY

IT'S Deanna Durbin's fourteenth picture, and marks a climactic turning point in her career.

As the sweet, unspoiled young girl who becomes a hardboiled hostess in a New Orleans roadhouse, Deanna makes her first bid as a dramatic actress.

The W. Somerset Maugham novel, from which the picture is adapted, is a story-within-a-story. Opening with an Officers' Candidate School graduation, and giving you Dean Harens as the young officer who receives his commission, then a wire from his fiancée telling him that she has married another man, the primary plot doesn't start to develop till several reels later.

It's Christmas Eve. The young officer has boarded a plane, intending to spend his holiday furlough in San Francisco, but the plane was grounded—in New Orleans. And there he meets Jackie LaMonte, and Jackie tells him that her real name is Abigail Manette. How she met, and married Robert Manette (Gene Kelly).

And then comes the stark melodrama, in review, of Manette's having committed murder, the vain attempts made by his young wife and his mother (Gale Sondergaard) to prevent a conviction.

The tragedy of the story takes an unexpected twist, stemming more from the characters themselves than from the actual happenings in which they're involved.

All the same, good direction and excellent performances can't be denied, in rendering a sum-total verdict.

Five Best Pictures MOVIELAND'S of the Month

(Warner Bros.)

THE MASK OF DIMITRIOS

SUSPENSEFUL drama covering the period from 1922 to 1938 and five different countries, with Peter Lorre playing a writer of mystery stories and finding himself involved in a plot, the complications of which make it not just one crime, but a whole series.

Lorre's adventures start in Istanbul, Turkey, in 1938, with the reported discovery of a stabbed body that has been washed ashore on a beach of the Bosphorus. Routine investigation by the Turkish police identifies the body as that of Dimitrios Makropoulos (Zachary Scott), a Greek fig packer when first known to the police 16 years before, but subsequently a political assassin, jewel smuggler and French boulevardier—until last heard of, in 1929.

Scenting a story, the writer takes up the trail of Dimitrios. It leads him to strange places (Smyrna, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia and Paris), catches him up in a web of intrigues, and leaves him confused after his meetings with a big Englishman (Sydney Greenstreet) who calls himself Mr. Peters, a beautiful woman turned middle-aged cafe-owner (Faye Emerson), and Grodek (Victor Françen), a scheming internationalist.

The Eric Ambler best-selling mystery novel, "A Coffin for Dimitrios" (from which this Warner Bros. screenplay is adapted) drops clues which weave in the conclusion, without giving it away.

Adult fare, but masterfully done. And definitely more than "just another mystery."

HAIL THE CONQUERING HERO

THE problem: what to do when you're the son of a Marine hero, wanting nothing so much as to serve the same motto and march to the same song and give your life, if need be, for the same cause—but you're turned down, because of hayfever?

The victim of this sad predicament: Eddie Bracken. And what's more, he's the guy things keep happening to; embarrassing situations, a well-intentioned deception that makes him the perpetrator of the most disgraceful sort of fraud.

Rather than admit his disqualification, he has sent letters to his mother, leading her to believe that he's a Marine, seeing active service over in the Pacific. "It's not right," decide a sextette of would-be good Marine samaritans. So they forcefully persuaded him to don uniform, notify his mother that he's a war hero returned and on his way home—and there starts trouble!

Home town trouble, with bands welcoming their boy who made good in the service, a mob of enthusiastic smalltown citizenry at the station to greet him—including the girl he left behind (Ella Raines), who's engaged to marry another man.

Catapulted through a series of predicaments, not the least of which is the campaign nominating him for mayor of the city, Bracken is given no chance to explain. All of which makes for a lot of fun, a lot of laughs, and sympathetic tears.

I LOVE A SOLDIER

NOT only faithfully representative, but vividly so—"I Love A Soldier," perhaps more than any other picture made since Pearl Harbor, rates the All-American award. For being, just that.

It's the American scene, the contemporary American homefront. A girl (Paulette Goddard) who works as a welder in a shipyard, by day; and very patriotically does her bit, as do a lot of other girls, dancing every night with men in uniform.

Set in San Francisco, it's a story that's taking place all over the country. There are the romance-starved schoolteachers like Paulette's rooming house friend (Mary Treen), who are meeting their men and marrying them. There are girls waiting for their young husbands to come back, and praying they will.

To Paulette, kissing the boys goodbye was a "for the duration" assignment. And she was determined to keep it at that, believing that to fall in love with any of these handsome soldiers would be just plain silly.

Which is her contention, even after the right man comes along. But which was not taking into account that the right man would be Sonny Tufts, a personable, persistently persuasive corporal back from many months of active service in the South Pacific!

Gives comedy, gives some heartwarming love scenes, gives some situations that are outrageously funny. But all so real, so convincing, so completely delightful.

(RKO)

STEP LIVELY

STRICTLY speaking "Step Lively" classifies as most any other musical, with comedy running at a fast and furious pace. But seen through the eyes of the hep cats and jive trade it's an out of the world hummer sending all that's expected.

Songs there are, and Frank Sinatra to sing them. What's more the swoon kid latches on to his first starring role and comes off at his best. In this version of the "Room Service" story, Sinatra plays the bewildered but good natured young playwright from Oswego who comes to New York, tangles with Producer George Murphy and manages to hold down the series of slapstick situations which follow to a pitch of boundary line credibility.

It's a story about twenty-two starving actors rehearsing a show that needs financing and a dithering hotel manager (Walter Slezak) worrying all the way through about who's going to pay the bill. Assisting ably on the melody side is Gloria De Haven, main queen for Sinatra and as sweet a little canary as you'd ever hope to see. Add Anne Jeffreys for the chirp department (which means she sings, and it's good); Adolphe Menjou as the heavy and Eugene Paulette as the angel's agent.

Set decorations are lavish, and the musical numbers fall splendiferously into being "Hollywood productions." Dancing girls, dazzling effects, trick arrangements galore.

Good fun all the way, though it's slightly off the cobb if you're judging critically.

INSIDE HOLLYWOOD

everyone in school, of course, but for Gwen there was a blue note in the jive. Don was recuperating in an army hospital from what appeared to be a breakdown as a result of too violent devotion to his G.I. duties.

RANK PRANK:

Ella Raines owns a dog, surname of Nugget. This animal's ancestry may be dubious, but his intelligence, obedience, and general utility as a pet can never be questioned. It has long been Ella's habit to call him by the rank of her husband. It was Lieutenant Nugget for some time, then it was Captain Nugget. Recently the pooch was given a third boost. He is now Major Nugget in honor of Major Kenneth Trout.

BEY DISMAY:

This is a story of practical devotion and dates in the 1944 manner. Susanna Foster lives in a penthouse on the very summit of one of Hollywood's highest hills. Halfway up to this aerie the pavement ends, and the subsequent dirt road is circuitous, rutted, and cliff-hanging.

Whenever she has had a date with Turhan Bey, she has issued an ultimatum: her tires are good and she knows the road very well even in the night blacker than a song written exclusively in flats, so she has driven her car down to the pavement-end, and there has parked. When Turhan arrived, she transferred into his car and away they went. At the end of the evening, she would leave Turhan, drive up the precipitous highway, then—having reached home safely—she would signal with a flashing of house lights that all was well. Romantic, huh?

One night a suspiciously long time elapsed between the time Susanna left Turhan and the time her car should have appeared on the hairpin turn just above, so Turhan set out hotfoot up the road. He found Susanna still sitting in her car, too afraid of disturbing the delicate balance of her car to move. Somehow she had killed her engine (bad gas) on a grade, and the car had almost backed off the highway into the canyon below. Turhan steadied the front of the car, gave Susanna a hand, then checked the situation: both rear wheels were spinning over space, but the differential was firmly snagged by undergrowth.

From now on, bad tires or no, Turhan is chauffeuring Susanna to her very door . . . it's much easier on his nerves.

RIB OF THE YEAR:

Much of the picture "Having Wonderful Crime" was shot at Del Monte Lodge, a magical spot on the Monterey peninsula. Pat O'Brien, Carole Landis, and George Murphy are the stars, and Eddie Sutherland directed, and reported in all verity below, is one of the highlights of the location trip Living at Del Monte Lodge is that entre preneur of soft watches, peripatetic crutches and insect-covered landscapes, Salvador Dali. When Pat arrived, he was domiciled in half of a double bungalow, the other hal of which was permanently occupied by Sen and Senora Dali. Pat, as everyone knows is convivial; Del Monte is filled with officers many of whom have returned from foreig service, so Pat set up a local Officer's Clu and held open house at all hours, much t the consternation of painter Dali.

Senor Dali complained to the management, which apologetically transferred Pat to another, distant, bungalow. That night, afte Pat had told everyone how bitterly he had annoyed genius at work, it occurred t George Murphy and Eddie Sutherland (wh were roommates) that they could have a littl fun with Pat.

George, a mimic of all-American stature, asked the hotel telephone operator to ring Pat's bungalow.

Pat answered somewhat foggily, as he had been asleep, and George—in a ric pseudo-Spanish accent—said that he wa Senor Dali and that it was with extreme r gret that he had learned of Pat's removal t other quarters because of complaints abou the noise.

Pat was courteous. He said it was okay. No harm done. Sorry he had been a bothe in the first place.

On the other end of the wire George's eye brows went to here and he winked at Eddi to let him know that Pat wasn't hep to th gag. Playing the role of Dali to the hil George said that—how do you say—sinc he had caused Senor O'Brien so much troubl would it be possible to earn his forgiveness perhaps, by joining Senor Dali the following afternoon for an aperitif—how you say cocktail?

The next morning Pat was in the hotel dining room when Eddie Sutherland arrived. "Y'know," Pat said warmly, "that fellow Dal is all right. He telephoned me last night and apologized—he really did—for his beet-ing to the management about my officers' parties. Asked me to have cocktails with him this afternoon. Pretty swell, huh?"

At that moment Dali entered the dining room.

"There he is now," beamed Pat. "Think I'll hop over for a word with him."

He leaned over Senor Dali's table and said heartily, "Good morning! Say, it was really swell of you to call last night. I appreciate that."

Now the fiction is that Dali speaks no English. French he speaks fluently. German, yes. Italian, somewhat. Spanish, like a machine gun. But English—no. He stared at Pat. He tossed out a few rapid French sentences.

Pat swallowed hard and explained that he didn't speak French.

Dali answered again in French.

Slowly, the crimson of embarrassment crept over Pat's open and honest countenance. "I beg your pardon," he said, bowing away. "I strongly suspect that there's been a misunderstanding."

When he returned to his own table, he gave Mr. Sutherland's extreme devotion to his cereal a searching glance. Said Mr. O'Brien, "Some blankety-blank so-and-so has just pulled the rib of the year on me, and I can guess what two so-and-sos are responsible." Then he leaned back and laughed until the dining room rafters rang.

TIME'S SIGNS:

Being a public personality has never been an assignment to be carried off lightly. Being a man in uniform, hence invested with a certain dash and glamour, has complicated the problems of many a man.

Soooo, Captain Burgess Meredith returned to the home he was sharing with his new wife, Paulette Goddard, and was admitted by the maid. "Could I have a private word with you?" said the maid to the bridegroom of two days.

Mr. Meredith, being both captain and public personality, said with a smile that she certainly could.

The maid straightened her shoulders and assumed the expression of Labor Militant. "Sir, I should like an advance in salary," she said.

Afterward, Burgess told his wife, "That clearly establishes me as the head of the household, my dear." Incidentally, his wedding gift to Paulette was the commissioning of celebrated portraitist Paul Clemens to preserve her in oils, the picture to be hung above the mantel. And a second gift was a huge globe. "You're going to be talking about your overseas trip for a long time," he opined with a twinkle, "so you might as well make it an illustrated lecture."

They were married, as you probably know, by an army chaplain who employed a ceremony devised for members of the Air Corps. Paulette secured a copy of the text and has placed it in her wedding book, which should prove that the girl who has been called Hollywood's most sophisticated also has her sentimental side.

TOOTH MYSTERY:

All during the filming of MGM's "National Velvet" 6-year-old Jackie Jenkins had a loose front tooth, but his mother, Doris Dudley, devoted a good deal of time and persuasion to keep him from shedding it. She might have succeeded except for the interference of a financial crisis.

Junior-wolf Jackie has a 10-year-old girl friend whose smiles fall most softly on our hero after he has purchased an ice cream bar for her. In order to earn the dime which this courtship costs, Jackie has long been assigned certain household duties, one of which is the periodic raking of leaves from the yard.

After having raked leaves for five minutes, he retired to the hammock and gave the entire situation some solemn thought. He had just remembered that when his older brother, Skipper, lost a baby tooth, he used to place it under his pillow. The next morning the elves would have put the snatch on the tooth (what elves wanted of a shed baby tooth Butch couldn't fathom), but they would have been gentlemen enough to have left a dime in payment.

That night, after Doris Dudley had put the children to bed, she went next door for a brief call on a neighbor. When she returned, she glanced into the boys' bedroom to check their welfare, only to be horrified by the great crimson blotch on Jackie's pillow. Frantically she awakened him, asking him what had happened.

"If you'll look under the pillow," mumbled an annoyed Jackie, "you'll find my tooth. In the morning it will be gone and a dime will be there."

Doris examined her son's dental condition. "But, darling, you pulled the wrong tooth," she protested, having caught sight of a pair of pliers at the side of the bed. "Your baby tooth on the other side wasn't even loose. This one," touching it lightly, "was the one that has been bothering you."

Butch closed his eyes and sighed in the manner of man sorely tried by the obtuseness of womankind. "I'm saving that one," he explained, "for a dime on Saturday."

CHILDREN'S HOUR:

Early this summer Edgar Bergen appeared at the J. Walter Thompson office to say a temporary goodbye to his friends there. He was going to Mexico on vacation.

"What about the children?" someone asked. "Are they all ready to go?"

"I'm not taking them," said Mr. Bergen. "I'm going on this trip because I need the rest. Any harried mother will tell you that there's no rest for a parent who takes youngsters traveling. My pair, particularly, would want to go to this party and that dinner. They would be showing off all the time and I'd have to spend most of my vacation sightseeing with them. No, this time they have to stay at home."

The "children": Charlie McCarthy and Mortimer Snerd.

DENNY MURPHY DEPT:

Many children are beautiful; most children have charm. But occasionally a child abundantly gifted of the gods is granted to astonished parents and eventually finds his way to a radio show. Item: When he broke his arm by falling off the moderately-sized dog house in the back yard, his father asked Denny, "What are you going to tell the kids at school?"

Denny chewed his lower lip judiciously. Then he shook his head in renunciation. "Nope," he said, "I guess I couldn't get away with that old one about being in a fight with a bear."

WOLF CALL:

As overseas entertainers must travel exceedingly light, Ann Sheridan had Milo Anderson, witty Warner Brothers designer, prepare a series of costumes made of thin, non-crushable, easily cleaned materials. As everyone knows, Annie is the relaxed type; probably no actress in Hollywood causes less furore and confusion in the wardrobe department than she. She always likes the clothes designed for her, never fusses nor feels that her "personality has not been properly expressed." She tells Milo what she needs, and doesn't even return for a fitting. A dressmaker's form suffices.

So Milo, devoted to Annie as most of her fellow-workers are, really went to town on his designing job. He dreamed up a series of bra-sarong numbers featuring bare midriffs and v-necklines. The colors were luscious, the tailoring impeccable, the result devastating. Then, after a telephone conference with Ann, Milo packed the clothes. She didn't see them until she unpacked for her first camp appearance, at which time she sent Mr. Anderson a one-line v-letter of appreciation expressed in terse Sheridan-ese: "Wolf calls all the way to Africa."

BOBBY SOX BULLETIN:

Nancy, Jr. and Frank, Jr., the two Sinatra children, are now the ecstatic owners of a black cocker spaniel properly called Mr. Buzz. Frank and his secretary, Jerry O'Shea, were admiring the puppy when Jerry said thoughtfully, "I'll never be able to call that winning creature 'Mr. Buzz.' When I look into his gorgeous, expressive dark eyes, all I can think of is Duke Ellington."

But—whisper this behind closed doors—Mr. Duke Buzz is a heretic! When Frankie practices, Buzz howls. And Nancy, Jr. clutches her chubby sides and howls, too—with laughter.

FORECAST:

Write it down in your Coming Events file that Barry Fitzgerald, who plays the aging priest in "Going My Way," will win the 1944 Academy Award Oscar for the best performance in a supporting role.

HOW SWEET THE SOUR NOTES:

When Leon Gordon, currently the producer of the Greer Garson-Walter Pidgeon picture, "Mrs. Parkington," and famed writer of "White Cargo" was in Italy several years ago, he was constantly irritated by the piano pounding that persisted in the hotel room adjoining his own. Early every morning, the conscientious musician next door began to run scales, despoiling Mr. Gordon's sleep.

Finally he could endure it no longer, so sent for the manager. "That drumming must be stopped," he stated flatly. "The constant thumping on that piano has become a shameful imposition on the patience of every guest on this side of the building."

The manager was properly contrite. "But I don't know exactly what to do about it," he explained apologetically. "You see, the man playing scales is Paderewski."

After a lax moment Mr. Gordon's lower jaw snapped into position. "That's quite different," he agreed promptly; thereafter he burnished his own prestige by inviting a favored few of his friends in occasionally "to hear a genius at an informal concert."

POST OFFICE:

Eddie Salven, assistant-director for C. B. de Mille, recently received a letter from Fred Allen, saying in part: "I may see you this summer but not unless you come close to me because my eyes are rather weak due to the local glare caused by the size of Bing Crosby's name in lights on the Paramount Theatre, in 'Going My Way.' A smart local man is renting Seeing Eye dogs to people who have to pass the theatre."

LETTER FROM DIETRICH:

Marlene Dietrich wrote to a friend, from somewhere in the European Theatre, "I have had pneumonia, but penicillin brought me out of it in a few days. I ran into Jean Pierre Aumont who is looking very well and who is doing fine work. Can you believe it—everywhere I went I saw that picture from Life Magazine showing me in the 'Kismet' costume with my gold legs! The boys seemed to like it. And now that the invasion has started perhaps I will have the great honor of following the troops into France and putting on shows as near the front lines as possible."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

$5.00 LETTER

I'm just a happy buck private expressing my thanks to John Garfield and the Ritz Brothers whom I've had the pleasure of meeting after both their performances.

When I first saw John Garfield on the screen, I really liked his acting more than some actors I have seen. Whenever I saw him, I'd get a feeling as if I had known him all my life, and you can imagine the thrill I received when I actually started talking with him after his performance. He wasn't at all independent as I expected him to be; it seemed as if I were talking with an old friend. He's a wonderful man, both on the screen and off. If there is any one who can build up a soldier's hope as well as he can, I think he's a wonderful and good soldier, and I hope to see him again before I leave for battle.

As for the Ritz Brothers, there is no limit to my appreciation for their remarkable performance. When they arrived at my camp, I went to see them the first night the show opened up, and I enjoyed them so much that I saw the show four times in the two days they were there. The Ritz Brothers and many other fine actors like them are part of America's morale, and they certainly live up to it.

So, I give my thanks and devotion to the Ritz Brothers and John Garfield and also to the actors and actresses on stage and screen who are helping to make this world a better place to live in.

THERE'S ONLY ONE CARY GRANT

word, he's disappeared into a whirling cloud of dust.

So you reach stage fifteen and step out of the California sunshine, and into the cavernous depths of a sound stage.

Suddenly you find yourself standing in a dirty, dingy street in the heart of London Town. Not that you've ever been in London, but you know now once and for all exactly what it's like. A deep fog settles over everything. You feel that any moment Cockney Englishmen will step from the shops and go about their work. At your right is a newspaper and magazine shop. A fish and chips stall is there across the street, and down the road a ways, a grocery store, with a tank of live gold fish swimming behind the window. The cobblestones are worn down by the traffic of centuries. Oh, it must be that way—they couldn't be made so real! Then you come to the focal point of the street, and peer through the dense fog up at the sign above the shop: "Motts—Old Furniture and New."

"Hey!" a voice pops up to startle you again. And again, it's Cary.

"Did you make your telephone call?" you ask.

"Yes," he replies.

Knowing Cary's dislike of talking about his private affairs, you fancy yourself as being enormously subtle when you say: "I understand your wife's out of town."

"And am I lonely!" Cary explodes, and he grins at you sort of wistfully and your heart does a couple of nip-ups all by itself.

"But say, isn't this fog terrific!" The wistful note has left his voice and he's all teeming enthusiasm for the work at hand.

"Yeah," you answer with a grim voice, because by this time the fog is beginning to seep into your skin and hair and clothes, and you feel grimy and your eyes burn.

"It's just like the real thing," says Cary, "Hey, Jack!"

Another figure floats into your vision out of the mists. It's Jack Lannon, one of the best special effects men in Hollywood—and that's something, in a town full of experts. Cary is impressed, too, because he's the kind of a guy who's impressed by anyone who does his job well.

"Tell her about it," says Cary, and then listens himself, fascinated, as Mr. Lannon explains that the fog is made of Nujol, an oil he insists will do wonders for the complexion. You rather doubtfully take his word for that.

Then Cary leads you over cables and through a London side street to behind the set, where the crew is fixing the lights for the next shot. Clifford Odets is there conferring with the cameraman, George Barnes. Odets is the famous playwright, author of "Golden Boy" and "Awake and Sing" and many other Broadway hits.

"Cliff wrote the scenario of 'None But the Lonely Heart'," Cary says. "It's a beautiful job. Now he's directing it."

Then you remember about that. David Hempstead, the producer, couldn't get just the right director for the story. He and Cary were talking one day and wondering what to do. Suddenly Cary remembered Odets.

"Listen, Odets knows how the script should be done," Cary said. "Why not try him?" So Hempstead said, "Why not?" And Odets said, "I'll try it." So that's the story.

"We won't want you right away, Cary," says Odets. "There's a shot first with Miss Barrymore alone."

"Miss Barrymore," murmurs Cary. "Have you seen Miss Barrymore?" There's a hushed, awed note in his voice. "What an actress!"

Odets is walking to the door of Miss Barrymore's portable dressing room. He knocks. "Miss Barrymore, we're ready," he says. Cary whispers, "Wait till you see her!"

The great lady appears. A silence falls upon the entire gathering. Odets offers his arm and leads her onto the stage. Ethel Barrymore, the First Lady of the American theater, walks like a queen to her work, with a golden radiance of charm and personality shining about her; while Cary Grant stands watching like a school boy, humble and solemn all at once. For Cary is an actor who knows what it means when another actor has greatness that has been acquired through fifty years.

So in this atmosphere of theatrical magic, you go with Cary into his cool, green dressing room, where the sound of your voices won't be picked up by the microphone.

"It's one of the great experiences of my life, to work with an actress like that," Cary says, still deep in the mood of reverence.

You look at Cary's thoughtful face and realize again what a deeply serious worker he is. In Hollywood they call him an "Actor's Actor." That means the actors themselves are crazy about his work. They go to see his pictures again and again, to study what he does and to try to figure out how he got that way.

It took the work of years to teach him, too. Not as many as Ethel Barrymore, but plenty—in innumerable kinds of theater jobs, which is the best way to learn. Every bit of it has been important, back to the days when he was Archie Leach, acrobat and stilt walker extraordinary.

"Now I can learn still more, working with Ethel Barrymore," he tells you. "I think she likes working with us. I hope so."

At that moment you hear the sound of a "sweet potato" playing. You're slightly startled. Cary is suddenly a bundle of vitality again. He leaps up, saying, "That's for me!" He grabs your hand, says, "Come on. Watch the scene." And all in a brief wild second you find yourself catapulted out of the dressing room and practically on the set. Your head is in a whirl all over again. They talk about Betty Hutton! Listen, she's got nothing on Cary Grant! He's the real tornado of the screen, if you want to know the truth.

You look around to see where the "sweet potato" came from and begin to think maybe you didn't hear it at all. But no. Perched high behind the camera is the assistant cameraman, who at this moment puts the "sweet potato" to his mouth and toots the Marine Hymn. Cary goes into a time step—and it's good, too. Ethel

Kim Hunter and Susanna Foster lunching at Brown Derby. Both girls are rising fast on the horizon of stardom. Susanna has been seen lately with that Turkish triple threat, Turhan Bey.

Barrymore, sitting in a canvas chair, puts back her head and laughs a lusty, full-throated laugh that reminds you of all the Barrymores rolled into one.

"Cary sure is an entertainer," says one of the stage hands. "Say, they tell me the show he puts on for the soldiers when he tours the camps is tops. He's got a hypnotist act that'll kill you. Hey, Cary!" he yells. "Don't the soldiers like your show?"

"Well, I have a good time, anyway," Cary grins evasively.

You feel the warmth and friendliness of the set surrounding you. It's a good feeling. It must make a swell atmosphere in which to work.

"Something happened the other day that was sure typical of Cary," your friend the stage hand continues. "A couple of servicemen came onto the set. They were standing off in a corner, and I sort of got to talking to them. I asked them, didn't they want to meet Cary. One of the soldiers acted kind of funny about it. Finally he broke down and said he used to work with Cary years ago on Coney Island. When Cary was a stilt walker this guy was a barker. The soldier was afraid Cary wouldn't remember him. Or that maybe, if he did remember, he'd be embarrassed."

After all, why shouldn't Cary forget? It was a heck of a long time ago, and Cary had made a big name in the meantime, and married Barbara Hutton, and a lot of things had happened.

Just then Cary saw them across the stage. He made a running dive, yelling out the soldier's name and grabbing his arm. The scene was held up ten minutes while Cary and the soldier hashed over the happy old days they'd spent working for peanuts on Coney Island.

"Maybe it was just peanuts, at that," the stage hand laughs.

Just then Odets calls everyone to work. The scene is the back dining room-kitchen of Ma Mott's shop, and Ethel Barrymore is serving Cary his supper.

Hanging on the wall beyond the table is a picture of a man in the costume of another year. "Did you love my old man?" asks Cary, as they start the first rehearsal. "Love's not for the poor, son," Miss Barrymore answers, and she looks up at the picture. Then Cary bursts out laughing. You're kind of surprised by that. It doesn't seem to belong to the scene they're playing. Cary says, "Hiya, Pop!" And that seems stranger still.

You look more closely at the picture. The man is tremendously handsome, much more so than Cary, if truth must be told. Cary turns and sees your troubled expression.

"Meet my Dad," he says. "Mr. Leach, Senior."

"Whaaat?" you mutter, really confused by this time.

"They couldn't find anything they thought looked like me, so I brought Pop down to play in the scene," Cary explains.

"Silence!" yells the assistant director. "Roll 'em!" yells the second assistant. A pause. Cary and Miss Barrymore are ready to begin.

When it's over, a deeply tragic scene, the people on the set are quiet. Cary walks away, and seems lost in his own thoughts. Odets gives Miss Barrymore his arm again, and leads her down from the stage back to her dressing room. She pauses in the doorway and looks towards Cary. "There," she says, nodding her head in his direction, "there is a real actor."

Cary looks up. He has overheard what she's said. A big grin spreads over his face as she goes into the room and closes the door behind her.

There's one more thing, however, before we leave. About this business of Cary's standing in the doorway of his dressing room, that day he wasn't working. Remember?

Business is booming these days over at RKO. They're making a raft of pictures, which means a lot of actors working. There's a shortage of building materials and carpenters, as you all know. Well, put two and two together and what do you get? Right! A shortage of dressing rooms.

So what happens? Well, you don't think they can let a dressing room stand idle when an actor isn't working, do you? And these actors are funny people. They're superstitious about having strangers in their dressing rooms.

So . . . I don't mean anything really. But after all, possession is nine points of the law—isn't it, Cary?

SMILEY BURNETTE

the Canyon," and many others you've heard Autry, Bing Crosby and other favorites singing.

In 1933, Mascot Productions (now Republic) plucked Autry from his hillbilly band to star in a Western serial called "The Phantom Empire." Smiley naturally came along. They made the picture, saw the rushes, and one Gene Autry and Smiley Burnette became 'Phantoms' themselves—but fast! Leaving Hollywood with flaming faces, vowing 'never again'. Louisville, Kentucky, and more Barn Dances, was their refuge.

But "The Phantom Empire" was released, and swept the country like a prairie fire It opened a new era for Westerns—for the roughriding cowhands, hardbitten sheriffs and silver-spurred heroes carried on their chores with a background of music. Western music.

Autry and Smiley were hastily recalled and placed under contract. For ten long years then, the Westerns continued, with ever-growing popularity. Hitching-post theaters sprang up and there were not enough good Westerns to fill the demand. Smiley went right on playing lead comic to the star, his pal Gene; writing songs for Gene to sing, and just being himself—the smalltown boy who kept his head and liked making people laugh. Acquiring the screen name of "Frog," he wore it like a medal on his broad chest. He should care what the kids called him, as long as they liked him!

When Autry joined the Army, Republic had Roy Rogers ready to take over the cowboy star spot. And Smiley, being Smiley, still went right on playing lead comic.

He took the perennial tours, made the bond drive appearances. And since he'd acquired a wife and a growing family, from whom he hated to be separated, he took them right along on the tours with him—in a big car with a trailer attached. (Until gas rationing.) To see Smiley really enthusiastic, to make him smile that infectious grin, just ask him about his family. His six-year-old daughter, little Linda! Stephen of the red hair, who is the in-between; and Baby Caroline who can't quite talk yet, except with her eyes.

In his professionally equipped workshop, Smiley makes teeter-totters and toys for the children's private playing yard. A born mechanic and "fixer," he's always busy making things for his friends—things made of metal and leather and beads, or whatever else happens to be handy. Usually what he turns out, if not for his own youngsters, are toys for his special kid-pals; cowboy belts are his specialty.

And besides his workshop, Smiley has an "office"—a combination recording and projection room, where he goes into seclusion when he feels a new song "coming on." There's no telling when that will be. Likely as not, he'll be in the midst of tending one of his famous barbecues, and have to leave just when the special sauce is most needing his attention. But grabbing the nearest handy instrument, he starts working out the new tune, singing it into his recording machine, and another hit is born. The studio musicians orchestrate the record he's made, and when Smiley sees the results on paper he looks at the notes with his big round eyes and marvels—"Gosh, it must be wonderful to be able to write music down like that!"

"And believe it or not, the guy means it. He's that awed; full of admiration, sincerely humble.

He's the number-one pin-up boy with the G.I.'s. And why? Because most of the boys he entertains are kids who grew up watching him on the screen. He knows what they wanted as kids, so he knows what they want in lonely camps, in foxholes and hospitals. They want to laugh. They want a few minutes of fun and happiness. Smiley gives it to them.

And that's the secret of his success, which he claims is no secret at all. The magic of Smiley's self-taught fingers, the spell of his haunting, lilting songs, the charm of his honest, simple, cheery personality and the enchantment of watching him recreate the old Wild West—that's his box-office value, that's what makes him Smiley Burnette.

year, acting; then I determined to head for a summer of stock in the East—and then Broadway. To my horror, Mother downright refused. I'll never forget that evening. I was insisting on going on with my career; Mother was refusing; and you sat twitching uneasily over a book you were holding upside down, and saying nothing at all. But I could read your mind. You were thinking, "Better leave the women alone—it'll all blow over!"

But it didn't blow over. How I got the will-power I'll never know, but the next morning I quietly packed my clothes, sneaked out of the house, and drove away without a word to anyone. I drove to my married sister's home, of course; but I wouldn't let her tell either of you—and for a week neither of you knew where I was. At the end of that time I was as much of a wreck as I later discovered both of you were, for I adored both of you; so I called Mother up. You know the rest—how she cried, and I cried, and I came home again. But you were the one I'd injured the most. I'll never forget how you looked—haggard and worn, and you'd stopped shooting in the middle of a picture, out of worry over me. I don't know how you ever forgave me for that scare. (Except that you'd run away from home yourself once, when you were a boy!)

But you did, and Mother had not only forgiven, but given up. So a few days later I left triumphantly for a dramatic school in Poughkeepsie, New York, where I spent the Summer doing mad things like acting out "A tree being eaten by worms," or "A piece of ice melting in a glass." Mad enough, but ridiculous enough, too, to make any shy actress lose all traces of shyness on the stage. If you could do those things in front of a student audience, you could do anything in front of a professional audience, I thought; and I headed instantly for Broadway.

This time, you were ready to offer all the help you could. You sent me a batch of letters introducing me to half the producers in New York, and I happily took them with me because again I was foolishly thinking, "Being Director Sam Wood's daughter should give me some kind of an acting break!"

Well, just let me show you what happened when I delivered each letter—whether it was to George Kaufmann, Sam Harris, Jed Harris, Max Gordon, or whomever. It was always the same. I came tripping brightly in, proffering the letter. The producer read it beamingly and then promptly said this (the dialogue never changed): "So you're Sam Wood's daughter! Well, well! How's your dad, anyway?"

Period. Full stop. Nobody ever added, "We've got a part for you in our next!" And so you very well know, the only way I got a part was behind your friends' backs!

It was in the road show of "You Can't Take It With You." Your good friend George Kaufmann, who wrote and directed the play, turned me down cold—but the stage manager hired me. Remember what Kaufmann said when he came to the first rehearsal? He gasped, and then grinned, and said, "Tell your father I gave you the job, eh, K. T.?"

For by this time I was K. T. Stevens. I'd dropped the name Gloria Wood, which I'd been wearing all these twenty years, because it hadn't seemed to help me much—if you'll forgive me saying so, Daddy dear! So I took the name of K. T. Stevens—because it was different for a girl to have initials, and because I didn't want people to think I was using you to get ahead (I'd tried it, I'll admit, but it certainly hadn't worked!)—and because K stood for Katherine Hepburn, whom I thought one of the finest actresses on the stage. Stevens had been my middle name all along, of course.

So in spite of your friends and your pull, not because of it, I went on acting in plays. In the road shows of "The Man Who Came to Dinner" and "My Sister Eileen," and in New York in "The Land Is Bright," and "Yankee Point" and "Nine Girls."

And how I loved New York! Remember the small apartment I had there, where I cooked all my meals (I love cooking second only to acting)? You saw it—you always saw me in every city I came to; because you faithfully came to every opening night I had, no matter where it was. And it always helped me to know you were out front, always. Which reminds me! Maybe you didn't help my business career, Daddy, but you certainly helped my romantic one! For it was through one of your dozens of friends that I met Afred Vanderbilt.

It was in Chicago, when I was doing "My Sister Eileen." Your friend telephoned me backstage and arranged a blind date for the same night, after the show. He took me, I remember, to the Chez Paris night club and the Pump Room; and as you know, he's been part of my life for the two and a half years since.

But you met him almost as soon as I did. You and Mother came to Chicago to be with me at Christmas time. Being an incurable cook, I had bought an enormous turkey to roast in my small apartment . . . and Al Vanderbilt and his friend, Ronald Brogan, volunteered to sit over it all during my matinee performance and see that it was basted correctly. Remember? Then I came dashing home, and tossed the rest of Christmas dinner together—and we all sat down to the best holiday meal I think I've ever had!

Yes, you met Al over food; and it seems to me you said goodbye to him (when he left for Naval duty) over food, too! Remember how thin he was when he applied for the Navy? He was under 130 pounds, which is pretty skinny for a young man almost six feet tall. And I fed him bananas and milk six times a day out at the Wood beach house in California, until he finally weighed 134 pounds and got admitted!

By that time I was in Hollywood and the movies, at last. I was in "Kitty Foyle," and then "The Great Man's Lady," and then "Address Unknown." And I was being as unglamour-girlish as I liked. (Which you thoroughly approved of and Mother was resigned to!) I mean, I was still staying away from parties; and I still wore no make-up except lipstick and mascara, and no nail polish, and no hats. Of course I was as mad about clothes as I'll always be —shoes and bags and gloves in particular—and any odd color from dusty pink to purple, and chartreuse. But I certainly shied away from parties, in favor of four movies a week. And I still preferred hamburgers and malted milks in drive-ins to the fanciest dinner-party in the world—and soda pop to hard liquor of any kind. And lying on the beach all day all Summer, instead of going to the tea-parties Mother turned up—getting brown as Boston beans, and never wearing a cap in swimming. Braids did just as well.

Maybe it was because of my gingham-girl tastes that you gave me the small beach house next to your big one. You couldn't have delighted me more! I immediately went color-mad on my new bedroom—it's a mass (or mess?) of the dubonnet, dusty pink and chartreuse. I also went kitchen-ware mad; and after I'd done the bedroom in colors, and the kitchen in pots and pans, I happily made my living room into the most comfortable, feet-on-everything room in the West. It's all in green, chartreuse and cherry red, with a bamboo bar and windows and bookcases everywhere, and a fireplace that my friends sit over half the night. But you made it complete with those seven color portraits from "For Whom the Bell Tolls."

My friends work hard when they're my guests on week-ends. I'll never forget your astonished expression when you walked in once and found Victor Mature washing dishes, while Al Vanderbilt and Sheila Ryan and Julie Warren and Johnny Forsythe and Barry Sullivan and John Hambleton all dried together! Anyway, you must know how I love that house —more even than steak (my favorite dish) or "Tabu" perfume (the only kind I've ever had on my dresser). In it, when I'm there alone, I read of an evening. Then I take my black poodle, Satin, for a walk. And then I come back and make myself Ovaltine and fall into bed for nine or ten hours. And just before I go to sleep every night, I think again that I want to be acting up until the day I step into my grave. And I also think of you, and the unique place you've had in my life, and . . .

Daddy, you know what? I just read this Declaration of Independence over, and I discovered that maybe my career has been Without Father. But you were around it, and behind it, and over it the whole long time! Without your friends, I'd never have met the man I will probably marry; and without your backing, I'd never have been able to go to all those dramatic schools that helped me so much; and without your thoughtfulness, I wouldn't even have the beach house roof over my head! And without your constant advice to "be natural in acting," maybe I wouldn't be acting at all!

I guess, after all, I should call this "Life With Father." And I should thank my lucky stars, at that!

All my love to you.

WHO IS HODIAK?

comes from swimming, golf, tennis and fishing. There is nothing artificial about this brown young actor. He's just a man—just as you suspected, just as you hoped!

But despite the fact that he was discovered by you women, you play a very small part in his life right now. He is a bachelor, and the kind of a bachelor any mother craves for her daughter. He has no heart-interests of any kind—unless you can count Roberta Bailey, whom he dates most steadily. She is three years old, and the daughter of his best friends, the Robert Baileys. And their dates, the tiny girl and tall young actor, are invariably at ice-cream parlors!

Otherwise, John looks like a ready mark for any determined huntress. He lives alone, in a two-room apartment in Beverly Hills for which he pays seventy dollars a month, and which he keeps so shipshape that the daily maid mutters happily, "He makes his bed so neatly I'd hardly know he slept in it!" In this tidy apartment John stays hibernating far more than any sensational bachelor should. Evening after evening, if you peeked through the windows, you could see him sitting there over books (detective, fiction, biography), while the air vibrates with symphonic and gut-bucket music from the radio. And if you waited at the doorstep, you would often see him starting on a three-hour tramp—provided the night was rainy. Walking in the rain is the only time to walk, according to John.

Often, too, he takes out his three-year-old gray convertible, in which he arrived in Hollywood, and drives to a Beverly Hills movie house to sit alone, concentrating on a picture, studying it. Of course, some nights he takes out grown-up girls—but not movie stars. They're radio friends he knew in the East. Usually he takes them to the Brown Derby or Romanoff's for dinner. And then, naturally, to a movie. Never a night club. Night clubs leave him cold.

But if you're interested in understanding John, the better to land him, you'd better know his history.

He was born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, thirty years ago. His father and mother were Ukrainian peasants who came to this country just before John's birth—Walter and Anna Pogorzeliec Hodiak. Walter Hodiak got a job at once in the coal mines, and they lived in Pittsburgh until they had four children—first John, then Walter Jr., then Ann and Mary. Eight years had passed when they moved to Hamtramck, the foreign section of Detroit where all the factory workers and farmers live. Here, in a world made up of Poles, Slavs, Greeks and Italians, John grew up.

It was the happiest of worlds to him. Every morning Father Hodiak went to work on the assembly lines of the Ford Motor Factory, swinging his dinner pail, and his four children went off to grammar schools with their smaller dinner pails. They came home at night to find Mother Hodiak singing Ukrainian songs in her immaculate kitchen, while she stirred Ukrainian food on the stove. Shashlik, and meat and rice wrapped

Are You in the Know?

In WAVE slanguage, she's —
☐ A destroyer
☐ On see duty
☐ Being convoyed

WAVES have words of their own! For instance, "being convoyed" means being on a date. "See duty" means the movies. The girl above is a destroyer (pretty WAVE)—and busy at her job. Any girl can sail through dates or duty with confidence, on calendar days—when she chooses Kotex. Because Kotex is the word for protection in sanitary napkins. That special 4-ply safety-center gives extra protection where you need it most. And Kotex has no wrong side to confuse you and cause embarrassing accidents!

E MADE PIES

☐ "Heart" trouble
☐ A high date quota
☐ Complexion blues

Snacks at the hamburger hangout are fun! But too many "fries" and double desserts may bring complexion blues. Go easy on rich foods. With sensible diet, daily scrubbing, your face can defy the keenest ogling. You can challenge costume closeups, too, on "those" days. Kotex sanitary napkins outwit telltale lines—for those patented Kotex ends are pressed flat—they don't show, because they're not thick, not stubby like some napkin ends. They're scientifically designed to keep Kotex snug-fitting...smoother!

Then, stick to your job, every working day. You can, with the help of Kotex. Kotex is more comfortable—has enduring softness, so different from pads that just "feel" soft at first touch. No bunching, no roping, as flimsy napkins do. You'll find Kotex holds its shape . . . actually stays soft while wearing!

in hot cabbage leaves, and a huge kettle of thick soup which simmered on the back of the stove all day and all night. The whole family rotated around her brisk gingham-clad figure. All summer she went bare-footed, and all winter she wore slippers and a sweater. And always the family spoke Ukrainian at home.

They owned their own house, a white frame one, which Father Hodiak bought for very little during the Depression. He also bought the lot next door. And the whole family pitched in to work on their home and make it livable. The six of them painted it, inside and out. And dug the ground up for a big vegetable garden, and made a chicken coop, and adopted three stray dogs who adopted them. Nighttimes, Father Hodiak acted in Ukrainian and Russian plays put on by the parish. And when his eldest son, John, was eleven, he too became an amateur actor.

He enjoyed it. But more than anything else, he enjoyed movies. Every Friday afternoon he ditched school to see the movies. Some films he saw over and over again. He saw Douglas Fairbanks in "The Thief of Bagdad" thirty-four times and "Robin Hood" twenty-one.

Then he was going to Hamtramck High School, and trying to make up his mind what to do in the world. He thought of the priesthood for awhile, but dismissed that. Then professional baseball, since he was offered a job by the St. Louis Cardinals after they saw him in action as a third baseman. Then Northwestern University offered him a dramatics scholarship, based on his acting in the high school and parish plays. But he turned that down, too, in favor of an appointment to West Point.

For he had decided at last; he would be an Army man. On this he based all his dreams and plans. And when his appointment fell through, he was heartbroken. He was also determined never to grieve again over what he wasn't intended to have. He graduated from Hamtramck High, and walked promptly into a Detroit radio station, an eighteen-year-old fatalist.

"I want a job acting," said he. "We'd suggest plumbing," said they, after listening to his fumbling diction. So then the fatalist walked out again, shrugging, and landed a job caddying at a nearby country club. The Depression was in full swing, and apparently all his great plans had degenerated into carrying some one's else golf clubs over the green.

But it all depended on whose clubs he was carrying, as it turned out. Several Sundays he toted the clubs of a businessman who was the budget director of the Chevrolet Motor Company. And one day the director asked John how he'd like a job in the office there. Now to a citizen of Hamtramck, a white-collar job was on a par with being president. An office man was a man of great stature. John snapped at the job. And for the next three years he left home in the morning dressed in a business suit, with a white shirt and a conservative tie, and went to work with his pride high within him. For all the neighbors said to Mrs. Hodiak, "You have a great boy there, Anna. A boy who can work at a desk, without having gone to college!"

His pay was forty-five dollars a week, and he was in their central business office. All day long he read aloud figures—expense sheets and production schedules. And unbeknownst to himself, all this reading aloud was steadily improving his diction. His fellow office workers knew that he was an amateur actor, and one morning one of them was waiting at the door for John, flapping a newspaper excitedly. "It says here there's an amateur radio audition, John. Why don't you try for it? Tonight?"

John did. He played a senator being interviewed on politics—and he won the audition. In his triumph, he rushed back home that midnight and rapped out a letter to the radio station which had turned him down, three and a half years before. It was quite a jeering letter, and the burden of its tune was, "In spite of you, I have succeeded!" He got a smashing letter back in the next mail. The manager of WXYZ called him a boastful upstart, and a number of other things—but he also challenged John to come in and show off his great improvement as an actor.

John was there after work that night, with the letter smoking in his hand, and was told to keep coming back. Because after all, he had promise. Not enough to be on pay, of course, but enough to learn the radio game by watching broadcasts in his spare time.

John's spare time was after five in the afternoon, when he finished work at the office. For the next six months, he spent every evening at the radio station. At the end of that time, he'd been a few voices in a few mob scenes, and he was offered a radio acting job at thirty-five dollars a week. It meant a ten-dollar weekly loss, but he accepted. And promptly!

Then he went home and broke the news at the family dinner table. "But, John, then you'll no longer be a white collar worker!" they said. They were distraught. They were funereal.

But John stuck to his guns, and for the next two years he played gravel-voiced villains in Detroit. Then, thinking he'd gone as far as he could in Detroit, he decided to push on to bigger radio things. Again, he went home to break his news to the family.

"I have decided to go to Chicago and try my lot in radio there. The radio station here offered me seventy-five dollars a week to stay, but I'm going. I have made up my mind."

Pandemonium again—the Hodiak family was horrified! In Hamtramck, nobody ever left town. If a man married, he moved a few houses away; but certainly nobody ever left town. "What will the neighbors think when you leave us?" said members of the family. "Whatever they will think," said John firmly, not too concerned.

So he took a bus to Chicago the next day. And his mother clung to him, and gave him only one piece of advice: "Always be well fed." He didn't tell her that he would reach Chicago with only enough money to be well fed at one meal. But fortunately, right after that meal (lunch), he got his first radio job in this strange, noisy metropolis full of towering buildings.

From then on, he did all right. He was desperately lonely, of course. But he made money—enough to buy himself that gray convertible he still has. And better yet, enough to send money home for a new frigidaire, a new radio, a new stove. Mrs. Hodiak wrote him about it. "All the neighbors have been in to look at the new things," she wrote. "They are wild with happiness for us."

Clustered around the new radio, the Hodiaks listened to John's voice coming from Chicago. They heard him originate the character of Li'l Abner on the air; they heard him in dozens of soap operas, and they heard him playing devious villains in "The Lone Ranger." Then, too, they heard his voice on the telephone—he called them faithfully once a week, just to say hello.

One week he called, terribly excited. "Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer is sending me to New York to make a screen test," said he. The next week he called from New York. "MGM has signed me—I'm going to Hollywood," he told them.

The next week—and every week since that—he has called them from Hollywood.

Which has been almost two years now. Two years of oblivion, until "Lifeboat" soared him into the starry heavens. And two years of readjustment for the Hodiak family back in Hamtramck—who are slavishly attending movies now, and feverishly reading the Ukrainian newspapers in the United States and Canada, which are wild with triumph over their native son.

But so far he's always been able to elude you women. Not two of you, of course; two who disillusioned him so that he swore he'd never believe in you again. But with those two in the past, he no longer wants to elude you. He very much wants to be happily married. So do his parents. "Only you, the eldest, is still single," they write him mournfully. "And we want so much to see you settled!"

Well, John's busily trying to find the girl who'll be the right Mrs. Hodiak. He even has his specifications. "She must be five feet two, lovely to look at, very intelligent, fond of music, a wonderful housekeeper—and the future mother of dozens of children!" says he, just as if these dream-girls are standing on every street-corner.

Meanwhile, he's keeping busy. He sees his friends, the Baileys, and their sub-debutante daughter, and film-cutter Watson Webb, and business manager Louis Melcher. He learns his lines in the hellzapoppin confusion of movie sets, and reads the newspapers when the lines are learned, thumbing mainly through the sports pages and the two comic strips, "Terry and the Pirates" and "Li'l Abner." And he's very happy. Happier than he's ever been in his life, even though he's still too nervous in his new success to eat more than one good meal a day. Coffee he calls breakfast, a wolfed sandwich is lunch, and only at dinner does he put away all the correct courses. At night he's too wound up to sleep more than four hours. The rest of the night he dreams, wide awake.

He has plenty of dreams, you see. One is of the fishing lodge he wants to own some day in the wettest part of Michigan. Another is of the day, after the war, when he can make a few Russian and South American movies. Another deals with the time, years from now, when he can combine acting with a complete study of music and history. But mostly he plans the house he will build in Hollywood for his parents, so that they can spend their winters in California. And for the day when there is a Mrs. John Hodiak. After all, you women discovered him—and he'd like to discover one of you, in exchange!

mean.) As for her figure, she's on the petite side, being five feet two and weighing one hundred and eight pounds. And her curves, shall we say, are in the right places. I could go on and on, but you get the general idea.

Gloria continued. "When I had a chance to go with Jan Savitt, I took it. We opened at the Hollywood Casino, which was sort of a miniature Palladium. In a short while Jan told me the band was going on the road. I didn't want to leave Hollywood, so I gave my two-weeks notice. But Jan finally talked me into going. He said he'd pay my mother's expenses so she could go along, too, and he offered me such a wonderful deal that I just couldn't turn it down. My agent promised to let me know if anything came up at a studio. So off we went on a tour of one-nighters, ending in New Orleans.

"While we were playing at the Roosevelt Hotel there, I got a wire from my agent saying he had lined me up an audition for one of the leads in 'Best Foot Forward' at Metro. He stressed the fact that it was only an audition, and though it looked good, I should realize I'd be just taking a chance if I came back. I didn't know what to do. The band was heading for the Pennsylvania Hotel in New York, and I thought that maybe I could get into a musical show or something, once we hit Broadway. Mother and I talked it over with Jan. He knew how much I had wanted a break in pictures and told me to go home and try for it. He said if I didn't, I'd always feel I'd missed something. I'll never forget Jan for being so wonderful to me. He even held my job so if I didn't get the part I could rejoin the band. Mother and I took the next train to Hollywood.

"When I went out to Metro I was really scared. There were so many girls there who had had so much picture experience. But none of them wanted the part any more than I did. So with my trusty 'Embraceable You,' my fingers crossed, and a huge prayer, I auditioned. Luck was certainly with me, because I got the part and a seven-year contract, too. And without a test, which still amazes me.

"During the shooting of 'Best Foot' I realized that I had a lot to learn about a lot of things. So when the picture was finished I took dramatic coaching and singing lessons at the studio. And I still go regularly, when I'm not working."

Gloria had never made a picture anywhere but at Metro until she was loaned to R.K.O. to cavort with Frank Sinatra in "Step Lively." Thinking that singing, dancing and acting with Frank would be more fun than work, I asked her about it.

"I was thrilled to death when I learned I was being loaned," she answered. And I butt right in with, "You don't mean that you, too, are a Sinatra fan!"

Without a second's hesitation she said, "I've always liked his singing. I used to go to the Paladium all the time to hear him when he was with Tommy Dorsey. My boy friends got mad because I wanted to stand in front of the band instead of dance. But I didn't meet Frank until just before we started production. I was called to R.K.O. to rehearse with Sammy Cahn and Julie Styne, who wrote the songs for the picture. It happened to be on the day of Frank's broadcast, so after rehearsing they took me down to meet him. He was very nice to me and told me how happy he was that I was going to work opposite him. When it was time to go on the air, I asked Frank if I could sit in the audience instead of in the booth. I had heard the kids sigh and carry on over the air so I thought it would be fun to watch them. A couple of little girls sitting next to me asked if I were Gloria De Haven and I said yes. After the broadcast one of them looked at me very sternly and in an angry voice said, 'Well! You weren't very enthusiastic!' I didn't get it at first, but she went on, 'All you did was applaud! You shouldn't sit in the front row if you don't enjoy it any more than that!' And indignantly she turned and stomped away.

"Sammy and Julie took me home and I didn't see Frank again until we started recording the tunes we did together. I was nervous as anything in the beginning, but Frank was simply wonderful to me. And he helped me so much, especially with my breathing. You know how he can hold out those long notes—sometimes they seem to last for an hour. He taught me little tricks of sustaining tones, and he even had me singing two notes higher than I ever have before. And when I thought I couldn't do something, he'd threaten me into it. Like the time we did 'The Gay Divorcée' on the Screen Guild broadcast.

"In the script, Frank did all the songs alone. But after the dress rehearsal the producer told us we were about three minutes short, so he had inserted 'The Continental' and he wanted Frank and me to do it as a duet. It was ten minutes before we were to go on the air. Axel Stordahl, Frank's conductor, marked the music where I was to come in and where Frank was to come in, and there was a fast scramble of passing out the parts to the band. I looked up at the clock, saw the second hand ticking away, and got absolutely petrified. Radio was an old thing to Frank, but it was practically new to me. Especially having to do something I wasn't familiar with. 'Frank, I just can't do it, that's all. You sing it alone, please!'

"'Don't be silly,' he said. 'Come on, we're going to run through it once in a hurry, and before you know it we'll be on the air. You won't have time even to think about being scared.'

"'But the key,' I pleaded. 'It's in your key and some of those high notes . . .'

"Frank stopped dead still and looked me right in the eye with, 'Gloria, you're supposed to be a trouper. You're not going to let me down, are you? After all, you're surely enough of a performer to do this—it's not that hard.'"

"Well, I guess that kind of talk was exactly what I needed. I didn't say a word. Frank signaled to Axel and we rehearsed the number. I got through it okay. A few seconds later the program began. Frank was right. I didn't think about being scared, and the show went off fine. Yes, you can call me a Sinatra fan, all right." (Incidentally, I think Sinatra likes the De Haven delivery, too. At the end of the picture he gifted her with a beautiful diamond and ruby ring.)

In case you people are lost, we are still in the Brown Derby. Ronald Colman entered and sat down just a few booths away from us. Gloria raised up to get a good look at him. "You may quote me, Jill," she laughed. "I have just swooned! Isn't he wonderful?"

"By the way, Gloria," I said, "speaking of swooning—just who is your dream boy? And what about these romance rumors concerning you and David Rose?"

"Well, they shouldn't be romance rumors, because we are only very good friends. Dave is one of my favorite people and we see a lot of each other because we like each other. He's a brilliant musician and composer, and naturally I'm interested in music.

"He's a sergeant in the Air Force, you know, and did the music for 'Winged Victory.' Since he has been stationed in California he has been coaching me in the fine art of driving a car. But I go out with other boys, too."

At this point some fans came over to our table and asked for Gloria's autograph. When they left, I said, "That's a sure sign of success, Gloria. How does it feel?"

Ramsay Ames, Macamba-dancing with Major Alan Martini, war hero with a recard far having dawned twenty-seven Jap airplanes.

"You know," she said honestly, "I get the biggest kick out of it. I think I always will."

"Let's get back to romance a minute," I prodded. "Now that your career is going along so smoothly, do you ever think about getting married?"

"I certainly do," she replied. "What young girl doesn't? But I don't think you can have both. A career and marriage, I mean. It didn't work out in my parents' case. They were both in the theatre, but they divorced when I was practically a baby. I've made up my mind that when I find the right boy I'll settle down and just be a wife. Because I want everything that goes with marriage—a home and children and all that. And you can't very well be on a sound stage and home with a baby at the same time.

"But right now I'm in no hurry. I know that when the right person comes along—well, he'll just come along, and I'll just marry him. I'm a bit of a fatalist, I guess. Why, I might even walk right out of the Brown Derby and meet him! Who knows?"

"Which reminds me," I hinted. "It might not be a bad idea if we left, anyway—whether we find your Prince Charming or not. The waiters must be beginning to think we're here for the night!"

As we left the Derby and walked up Vine Street, the lane where so many careers have had their start and finish, I couldn't help thinking that here was one kid who would do all right—whether it be leading lady to Frank Sinatra, or just plain Mrs. to some lucky guy. She's okay by me.

MOST IMPORTANT DAY IN MY LIFE

cheer me up, especially the piano player, Lou Bush. Just the same, I wasn't able to sing the first show. The second one, I did, and later joined the band. That was important, too—but not nearly so important as the fact that Lou and I became friends that day."

For Irene Dunne, it was the day she met Dr. Francis Griffin, who is now her husband. It happened at a penthouse party in New York. Irene was the star of "Sweetheart Time," Dr. Griffin was a dentist from New England who prefered not to fall in love with an actress. He weakened enough at the party to ask someone to introduce him to Irene and to ask her for her telephone number. Then he changed his mind again, and didn't call her for three weeks.

"I was furious," Irene said, "because I liked him from the start. I made up my mind that I'd really tell him off, when he finally did call. Then when he did, I found myself suddenly saying very meekly: 'Yes, I'll be happy to go out with you'."

The most important day in Dana Andrews' life was one back in 1931, when he decided on a theatrical career:

"I was chief accountant for a firm in Austin, Texas," Dana tells, "and not too pleased with the progress I was making. I began to think seriously of giving up my job and trying for a theatrical career. I'd been studying singing for some time. Then one day a wonderful chance came my way. A rival oil company offered me a job with them, at a large increase in salary and with unlimited opportunities for advancement.

"It seemed like a wonderful break, and I knew I'd be giving up a sure thing to take a gamble, if I decided not to accept. I weighed one prospect against the other—should it be business excutive or a problematical future as an actor? Finally I decided to take a chance—and with $25 in my pocket, set out for Hollywood.

"For a while it certainly looked as though I'd guessed wrong. The first job I had out here was as a bus driver for $10 a week."

With Eve Arden, as with Gene Tierney, her wedding day was the most important in her life.

"The year previous to my mariage was a tough one for me to weather," Eve says. "I lost my mother, my grandmother, and my favorite aunt. It turned my particular world topsy-turvy and left me with the most frightening feeling of being lost, of not belonging. I suddenly didn't care what happened to me. I was beholden to no one. I felt that no one would shed a tear or raise an eyebrow at anything I did or said.

"Then one day I met Ned Berman, a successful New York insurance broker. Something electric happened between us the minute we met. We fought like cats and dogs every day for five months, until I woke up one morning with the realization that my part in the bickering had been a confused sort of release, a kind of metamorphosis. I realized my personality was trying to readjust itself to the fact that after a year of complete indifference and independence, I was suddenly accountable to someone who sincerely cared what I made of myself, and what I did with my life. The next day Ned and I drove to Reno, where everyone else was being divorced, and were married."

For Gail Russsell, it was a day at Technical High School in Santa Monica, when she found a note on her desk: "Please telephone Milton Lewis of Paramount Studios, regarding screen test."

"I thought it was a practical joke," Gail says, "and threw the note into the wastebasket. They weren't going to catch me with any gag as fantastic as that.

It was the Hollywood party of the month. Sam Goldwyn was the host, entertaining on the "Belle of the Yukon" set. Gypsy Rose Lee (the belle) was wide-eyed for Gary Cooper.

Former Hollywood star, now in the Coast Guard, Victor Mature stopped in at Sylvio Annenberg's florist shop on Madison Avenue in New York City to buy roses for his best girl (name undisclosed) and found the shop's employees in the process of binding up bales of paper to contribute to waste paper salvage drive. So Victor pitched in to help.

"But after school, my teacher called me over. 'Did you make the phone call?' she asked. I explained that it was just a gag. Then she told me that she herself had put the note on my desk.

"I waited until all the other kids had left," Gail confesses, "and then sneaked back to get the note."

Gail found out later that Paramount's talent scout had picked up two schoolboy hitchikers one day, who had raved so much about Gail he had decided to send for her.

But even after she had found out the offer of a screen test was on the level, the day was not one of unmitigated joy for Gail. She spent the next hour or so crying, because the dress she wanted to wear had been washed that morning, and was too wet to iron. She finally went in her school dress.

Zachary Scott's most important day, he declares, was "the day I put my best foot forward on the path that led to Broadway, and ultimately to Hollywood. (He has a lead role in "The Mask of Dimitrios.")

"On that day, ten years ago, I was on a brief holiday in Bath, England, and I met the famous British stage director, Gerard Neville. Neville was a charming, intelligent man. He, the mutual friend who introduced us, and I spent the day chatting about books, plays, and actors, walking through the countryside and finally, having dinner.

"I didn't know, at the time, that my friend had already told Neville of my theatrical aspirations, nor did I know that during the entire day I spent with him, Neville was sizing me up—that I was on "try-out" for a specific stage role he had in mind.

"The next day he phoned me at my hotel to tell me he had decided to give me the juvenile lead in his next play, 'The Outsider', which was to open at Bath's Theatre Royale, one of the oldest theatres in England.

"It proved to be the springboard for Broadway, and later Hollywood."

WORDS OF MUSIC

great Basie piano accompanied by his rhythm section: bass, guitar and drums. The tunes are all in the indigo mood, including his famous "How Long Blues" and "Sugar Blues." During the recording of this album Basie requested the Columbia boys to turn off all the lights in the studio. He had always appeared with a full band and he felt lost in the large room. So they agreed. And the good Count played all his numbers in the dark. But the engineer has to see his control board, so some poor character stood by and struck thirty-five packs of matches during the session. The result was a burned finger or two, and a heck of a good Basie album.

Xavier Cugat is in again, with a single record of "Amor" and "No Te Importe Saber." This disc was cut way back in August of 1942, but Cugat, who knows his Latin ditties, prophesied that "Amor" would one day be on the hit parade. And he was right.

Here's Harry James with "Memphis Blues" and "Sleepy Time Gal," both instrumentals and both heavily featuring the James horn. This was also made a couple of years back. I recently heard an amusing story about this record. When some of the hot jazz collectors found out it was going to be released they put in advance orders, offering as much as five dollars for the platter. And some of them actually paid that much, not knowing that the O.P.A. ceiling price was a mere fifty cents plus tax.

DECCA:

We have another show album, this time the Cole Porter score from the New York hit show, "Mexican Hayride." The artists are June Havoc, Corinna Mura, Wilbur Evans and the original chorus and orchestra. . . .

Morton Downey, a new addition to the Decca Company, is heard on his first record in a long time. It's "Spring Will Be A Little Late This Year" and "Christopher Robin Is Saying His Prayers." "Spring" is the beautiful Frank Loesser tune from Deanna Durbin's picture, "Christmas Holiday". . . .

If you're a Dick Haymes fan, you'll want his new pressing of "How Blue The Night" and "How Many Times Do I Have To Tell You?" These are two of the tunes Dick sang in his first picture, "Four Jills And A Jeep."

Decca has issued another album in its Collectors' Series—"Ellingtonia," Volume II. There are eight sides in all, including such old Ellington favorites as "Tiger Rag," "Yellow Dog Blues," and "Awful Sad." All the tunes were originally recorded on the Brunswick label. There are some fine solos by Johnny Hodges and Cootie Williams, and plenty of the Duke's piano. . . .

The Andrews Sisters' newest swingeroo is "Straighten Up And Fly Right" and "Tico-Tico," with Vic Schoen's orchestra. The girls decided not to re-sign with Universal when their recent contract expired. Practically every major studio in Hollywood would like to nab them because of their solid position at the box office.

As far as the country's record dealers are concerned, Bing Crosby can do no wrong. He sold seven million platters in 1943. And this year they expect the figure to jump to ten. His new waxing of "Long Ago and Far Away" and "Amor" should do about a million all by itself.

Mary Martin, who has bid the movies goodbye in favor of the New York stage, has taken time out from her duties in "One Touch Of Venus" to make "Goodnight, Wherever You Are" and "I'll Walk Alone." Toots Camarata's orchestra.

Ella Fitzgerald is present and accounted for in a swell new coupling, "Once Too Often" and "Time Alone Will Tell." Both tunes are from the movie "Pin-Up Girl."

VICTOR:

As a tribute to the late Fats Waller, Victor is releasing a memorial album, "Fats Waller Favorites." Eight representative sides of the biggest Waller hits: "Honeysuckle Rose," "Your Feets Too Big," "Ain't Misbehavin'," "Hold Tight," "I Can't Give You Anything But Love, Baby," "The Joint Is Jumpin'," "Two Sleepy People" and "The Minor Drag." "Honeysuckle" has never been released before in this version. On "The Minor Drag" you will hear some banjo work by the now famous jazz guitarist, Eddie Condon. This tune was recorded years ago, when Fats was billed as "Fats Waller And His Buddies." . . .

Here's a wonderful re-issue you'll want if you don't already own it. The famous Coleman Hawkins tenor saxophone record of "Body and Soul." Many jazz critics consider this to be the greatest tenor sax solo ever recorded. Until this re-issue, this platter has been a collector's item and practically impossible to get except at a fantastic price. On the reverse side is another old tune, which has recently enjoyed a popular revival, "It Had To Be You," by Earl "Father" Hines and his orchestra. . . .

Many of the biggest names of the music business rode to fame on the Tommy Dorsey bandwagon. So Victor has made up a Tommy Dorsey "Star Maker" album of eight sides, featuring some of the graduates of the T. D. orchestra. Included are Trumpeter Ziggy Elman, now in the army, playing "Swing High," "Little Man With A Candy Cigar" with Jo Stafford; Connie Haines on "Will You Still Be Mine"; Frank Sinatra, the most famous Dorsey alumnus, singing "Everything Happens To Me"; and Connie, Frank and the Pied Pipers together, doing "Oh, Look At Me Now."

CAPITOL:

"New American Jazz." That's the title of The Capitol Company's first album. And it's a set that you'll want for many reasons. Some of the nation's most famous exponents of jazz are featured, including Joe Sullivan, Jack Teagarden, Eddie Miller, Pete Johnson, the boogie-woogie man; the late Jimmie Noone, Zutty Singleton and others. Eight sides with such tunes as "Sugar," "In My Solitude" and "Someday Sweetheart."

Peggy Lee, who was so popular with Steve Crane (he's doing "Tonight and Every Night" at Columbia, with Rita Hayworth), on his first date since separating from Lana. The gal? She's Virginia Hill.

Benny Goodman a few years ago, is in for two vocals, "That Old Feeling" and "Ain't Goin' No Place." The latter tune was specially written for her by Dick Larkin, and she sings it in her very best "Why Don't You Do Right?" style. I happened to be present the day she recorded this one and the first thing I did was to ask her what everyone has wanted to know—why she gave up singing. She told me that after her baby was born she felt she just wanted to stay home and be Mrs. Dave Barbour. (Dave is a fine guitarist and also plays on this album.)

JAM NOTES:

Capt. Glenn Miller spent his furlough on his ranch in California. Rumors still persist that Miller will be retired to inactive duty. But his intimates say that Glenn would like to go overseas with his band . . . Lt. Vallee may be back in civilian life by the time you read this. If he does leave the Navy, he will have a radio show in the fall . . . Still more news of music men leaving the service. Dean Hudson was discharged from the Marines and helped Tommy Dorsey reorganize his present band. Then he got together an outfit of his own . . . Buddy Rich is also out of the Marines and at the present time is back with his old boss, T. D. 'Tis said that Buddy is receiving seven hundred and fifty dollars a week. Not bad!

Gene Krupa has been rehearsing a new band in New York. And according to the gossip columnists, he has a big romance with Carol Bruce . . . Keep your eye on Boyd Raeburn. His band is coming up very fast . . . Bonnie Lou Williams, new chirper with Tommy Dorsey, is a Johnny Mercer discovery . . . Betty Brewer is now playing the lead in the road company revival of "Let's Face It." . . . Harry James is dickering for the purchase of a West Coast ballroom so he won't have to leave home and Betty to travel around the country. . . .

Helen Forrest is Hollywood's newest glamour girl. I never would have imagined her as a blonde, but she's much more attractive than she was as a brunette.

Nice having Dick Haymes back on the air with his "Everything For The Boys" program over NBC. Dick recently bought a furnished house with swimming pool and badminton court. He could use the pool and court but had no use for a billiard table he found in the play room. So he sent it to his pal, Joe Venuti, who is a billiard fiend. A few days later Dick received a note from Mrs. Venuti, thanking him profusely. "Dick, you've changed my whole life," she wrote. "Now Joe stays home to play and I do see him once in a while, if only between shots." . . .

Ginnie Powell, Jerry Wald's pretty vocalist, will be screen tested by both Warner's and Paramount . . . Elizabeth Tilton remained in Los Angeles when the Garber band went on the road. She wanted to be near her soldier-husband, who is stationed in California . . . After several false starts from his draft board, Vido Musso finally left Woody Herman and was inducted into the Marines . . .

Kay Armen is the center of discussion when it comes to new singers. Her Decca disc of "You're The Dream" sold close to a million copies. Kay got her start demonstrating songs for music publishers in Chicago. One publisher thought her voice was so wonderful he got her a job on a sustaining network show in Nashville, Tennessee. The Decca people heard her, signed her to come to N. Y.

Jimmy Van Heusen, who wrote the score for the picture, "Going My Way," recently wrote a tune called "Nancy, With The Laughing Face" which he dedicated to Frank Sinatra's four-year-old daughter. The tune has been published and all the royalties will be put into a trust fund for Nancy.

LITTLE MISS MARGARET

Her current problem is calling to Margaret's attention that fantasy is very useful in its place, but its place is in the studio. Margaret went to a party recently. And, when Mrs. O'Brien called for her daughter, the hostess said, "Well, goodbye, Margaret. I'm so sorry you weren't hungry. I'm sure you would have liked the ice cream and cake."

Mrs. O'Brien asked in some surprise, "Weren't you hungry, Margaret?"

Smilingly, the hostess interposed, "She said she had eaten two bowls of tomato soup just before she came to the party, so I imagine that was the reason she wasn't hungry."

Margaret stared virtuously into the middle distance.

In the car, on the way home, Mrs. O'Brien asked severely about the fictitious tomato soup. "You hadn't had a bit of luncheon, so that was a story. Why did say say such a thing?"

The mendacious one couldn't think of a good reason, but agreed that she mustn't dream up a quart of soup simply for purposes of drama hereafter.

Once Margaret's contemporaries get accustomed to the idea that, despite her cinematic career, she is just like any other little girl, they accept her wholeheartedly and with the loud iconoclasm of childhood. She gets kidded, shoved around, and called down along with the rest of the gang.

But before this free masonry is established, Margaret sometimes goes through a few bad moments. Last winter, when she was in New York, she was allowed to go "skating" in Central Park. She simply joined the other kids on the juvenile ice pond and slid around in galoshes that had grown pleasantly slick from dampness. The other skaters looked her over, and accepted her; they pushed her around, included her in crack-the-whip, and laughed when she took a spill.

Then one afternoon two of the children approached her with a question. "Is your name really Margaret O'Brien?"

"Yes," she said, in a meek, wishing-she-could-deny-it little voice.

"We went to a movie yesterday and saw 'Lost Angel.' Was that little girl really, truly you?"

Margaret, still more uneasily, admitted the charge.

"Oh," said the kids. They passed the news around. After that she was treated with great formality. She wasn't pushed nor shoved nor included in the rougher games. She had become something strange and rare and fragile. It puzzled Margaret and made her uncomfortable. Skating ceased to be fun because she had to do it alone, before the staring eyes of her erstwhile friends. She was glad when she boarded the train headed for Hollywood, where even big people play games with her.

Margaret adores Jimmie Craig who played opposite her in "Lost Angel." Jimmie has a son of his own, somewhat younger than Margaret, who is the very core of his being. He understands children. On the set he used to tell Margaret stories about Bub, his own little boy, and about Texas

Let these guys start it!

There's a day coming when you'll want to stand up and cheer the greatest victory in history.

But let's not start cheering yet.

In fact, let's not start it at all—over here. Let's leave it to the fellows who are doing the job—to begin the celebrating.

Our leaders have told us that smashing the Axis will be a slow, dangerous, bloody job.

If we at home start throwing our hats in the air and easing up before the job's completely done, it will be slower, more dangerous, bloodier.

Right now, it's up to us to keep on buying War Bonds until this war is won.

Let's keep bearing down till we get the news of final victory from the only place such news can come: the battleline.

If we do that, we'll have the right to join the cheering when the time comes.

Keep backing 'em up with War Bonds

It's nice work if you can get it and comic Lou Costello is getting it. In addition to having bankrolled Biltmore Production's "A WAVE, a WAC and a Marine," which gives him this opportunity to be surrounded by screen lovelies, Costello is also surrounded by gorgeous femininity in "Lost In A Harem."

where Jimmie grew up.

They went into a huddle on the hopscotch situation and purloined some chalk to draw a course on the cement ramp just outside the stage. Instead of the flat stones that most children use for markers, Margaret used the backs of cigarette matchbooks, courtesy of J. Craig.

In addition to being the hopscotch champion of Culver City, Margaret is probably the only female featherweight collector of guns in the state. Mrs. O'Brien has never approved of children owning guns of any sort, but her young daughter cherished other ideas. She became engrossed in the history of Belle Starr and went around telling people about it. Well, you know how eager adults are to frequent toy departments. Margaret's hobby gave them an excuse to look into the gun situation. So Miss O'Brien now owns seven, and can play Belle Starr with everything from a water pistol to a wooden machine gun.

Some of her dramas are borrowed from the comic strips, although she doesn't take the doting interest in such books that many children do. She is likely to ask her mother, when they are shopping, for one comic book rather than the half a dozen which is par for most juvenile demands.

When they have reached home, she will seat herself quietly in a corner and look over the book, page by page, very carefully. That done, she is through with the book forever.

She is just learning to read, but she seems to have a space sense of sentence structure already. She likes to have her mother read stories from current periodicals. So, before complying with this request, Mrs. O'Brien usually scans the stories to be sure that she will know where any statement or passage that Margaret might not understand, occurs. Then, when reading, Mrs. O'Brien calmly skips the paragraph. But this system is no longer in good working order. Lately, Margaret has interrupted coolly to Rarest shot of the month. Mr. and Mrs. Paul Muni. These two aren't seen very often in the social-whirl, but they came out of hiding to attend "Story of Dr. Wassell" premiere.

observe, "You skipped something right there. Go back and read that, too."

She learns her dialogue for motion pictures by having the lines read to her. She repeats them once or twice and they are hers for the duration of the shooting. Sometimes, when confronted afterward by an actual situation approximating one she has acted in a picture, she will produce a half-forgotten line of dialogue in true theatrical tradition. She knows what she is doing, too, and gets a kick out of it.

There is every chance that she will one day be the best-dressed woman on the screen, because she has a well-developed clothes sense even at this early date. Her bright hazel eyes scan every big girl she sees on the Metro lot. Recently she has been swiping her mother's precious bobby pins to fasten her beret to the crown of her head. She is crazy about sweaters—sloppy joes—and, if Mrs. O'Brien doesn't see her when she is dressing, she will wear her sweaters over her jumper straps to hide them. Or she will tuck the straps inside her skirt and pin the band tight.

She fell in love with the "Brownie" shoes (Brownies are the junior branch of the British Girl Guides), that she wears in "The Canterville Ghost," and bedeviled her mother into buying a pair for the O'Brien personal wardrobe . . . a typical star stunt.

Perhaps her greatest charm is her naturalness, combined with an ingratiating intelligence. She is the epitome of childhood as every adult sentimentally thinks it should be. As one woman stated it, "Margaret's great claim upon the affection of the world lies in the fact that she causes every man or woman in the audience to wish for a child exactly like her." She makes concrete the ambition of each average adult to have—not breathlessly beautiful nor frighteningly precocious children—but healthy, normal, interesting offspring.

YOUR PROBLEM AND MINE

interest in drawing, and people say I am pretty good for an amateur.

Because I want to do something for myself, I would like very much to get a few lessons in art, and wondered if you knew any way that I could get some through the mail from some place.

I will appreciate your help very much.

Yours truly,
Michael

Dear Michael:

Good for you! Your interest in art is a grand thing, for not only will it become a hobby for you, but it may develop into something even better.

I am sure that if you write to the Art Department of your local High School or College, the director in charge there would be only too glad to make arrangements of some kind whereby a sort of "correspondence course" could be mailed to you.

You might also try writing to the local Y.M.C.A. on this problem. Good luck to you.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Bonita:

I am twenty-one and have such a terrible inferiority complex that it makes me most unhappy and moody. I am ill at ease around people, and am sure that they all pity me. Perhaps it is because of my appearance. I am 5′ 6″ tall and weigh 130 lbs., and this makes me feel awkward in front of people, although dieting does me no good at all.

Can you suggest some way that I can overcome this feeling of inferiority? I work in a defense plant, but would like to have some fun once in a while.

Sincerely yours,
Mildred

Dear Mildred:

I don't understand your reference to your height and weight as "a problem." There are many stars in Hollywood whose measurements are the same as yours.

You are the only one who can solve this problem of an inferiority complex, because apparently you are self-centered. Force yourself out of this. Get out among people, whether in company, sports activities or social functions, or church groups or just at lunch time. And remember that your imagination is working overtime if you think people are always looking at you and pitying you.

Augment your good work in the defense plant with such outside interests as sports, Red Cross work, etc., and you will be surprised how your problem will diminish in importance, until there will be nothing left of it. Why not try this?

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Bonita:

My problem is that I have nothing to do at night. I am in High School and my mother works until late and won't let me go out for fear I will get into trouble. I don't know what I am supposed to do with myself. What would you do?

Sincerely yours,
Dorothy

Dear Dorothy:

Don't you think you are being selfish?

With everything that is being done for the war effort, and with your mother working, isn't it time for you to think of yourself in terms of accepting a little responsibility and doing something about it?

How about inviting some of your friends to form a knitting group for the Red Cross, or getting your mother's dinner and trying to make her working day a little easier for her when she comes home?

Personally, I was certainly not allowed to go out when I was your age, but I managed to have a lot of friends, and the best friend was my mother.

Accept this responsibility and see if you can make both your mother and yourself happier by it.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Bonita:

My parents do not allow me to go out with boys, and that is pretty hard to take. But now they even want me to discontinue writing to the boys I know who are overseas, for they feel this might make the boys like me too much.

They were just impersonal, friendly letters, and don't you think that is all right?

Please answer me, so that I can tell my parents about this.

Sincerely yours,
Jean

Dear Jean:

Your parents are perfectly justified in questioning your letters to the boys in the services, because it would be decidedly unfair if you did write intimate letters to boys who are "only friends."

However, perhaps if you point out to your parents the vital importance of mail to the boys in the service, and share your letters with them, they will not only approve of your correspondence, but even encourage it. Mail Call is the most important event in the life of the soldier, as any one of them will attest. And the right kind of chatty, impersonal letter is a vital help to the war effort.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Miss Granville:

I know this sounds very childish and silly, but my problem is that I am afraid of dogs. Whenever I enter a place where there is a dog, whatever the size or kind of dog, I nearly go into hysterics. I can't help myself and don't know what to do about this, because many of my friends have dogs and so I cannot visit them. But I don't want to tell them why, silly as it sounds, and so this becomes a very embarrassing problem.

Please help me if you can,
Doris

Dear Doris:

No, your problem is not silly—and I will tell you a secret: For many years I had the same kind of fear, so I can sympathize with you. I could not go near a dog, and when I had to act in the same room with two Great Danes in a picture, it took all the control I could muster to face the working day. Then my mother bought me a tiny baby Peke, and as I watched this puppy grow up, my fear gradually disappeared—so that today there is not a trace of it left. I am now a firm dog-lover.

Why not try this method, and see if you, too, can overcome your fear? The problem is within yourself, and you must cure it as I did—by yourself.

Good luck.

Sincerely,
BG

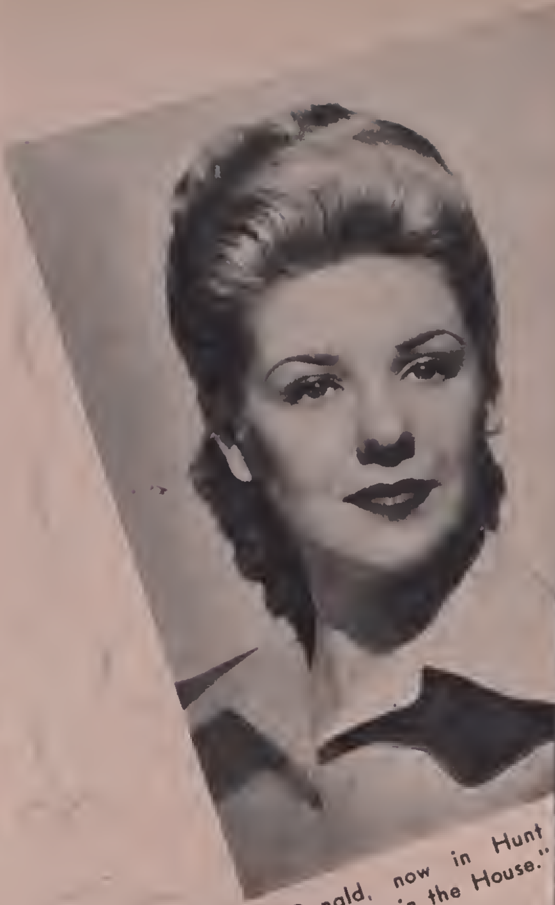
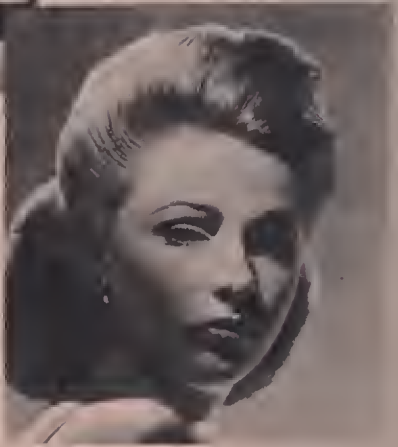
The Long View



Marie McDonald, now in Hunt Stromberg's "Guest in the House."



Vicki Styles, appearing in David O. Selznick's "Since You Went Away."

THE Hollywood glamour bob has, at last, been really glamourized. No more unmanageable manes for the movies. Instead, a new look that's both chic and sleek.

If you've been clinging to longer locks (and I'll bet you have!) why not try one of the attractive hair styles which Marie McDonald and Vicki Styles wear so well?

Both girls prefer a pompadour, but not the towering type. In the face of flat tops and feather cuts, such modified height is still good. And frequently more flattering.

For the same effect, part your hair across the crown and set the long front ends in loose pin curls. Make at least two rows, preferably three, and turn the rows in opposite directions to each other.

When the curls are dry, form your wave by holding the hair close to the roots and brushing up and back. Flip the ends under and fasten them invisibly with bob pins. Better still, brush the waved section over a regular pompadour roll to give it extra body and security.

To complement this smooth front hairline, you must settle for a simple, well-controlled back view. You'll notice that while Marie wears curls at the nape of her neck, they are closely clustered—neither casual nor untidy. Vicki's super-size chignon is another neat and knowing solution. Her shoulder length tresses have been ruffed a bit, then brushed over a filler of wool crepe. A thin net, over all, holds this big bun firmly in place.

Suppose, though, your hair isn't quite as plentiful as it might be. There's still a way to make it look more luxurious. The trick, in case you don't know, is to "layer-brush" it. Part your locks in one long sweep, from back to front. Then wield a hairbrush briskly, lifting the hair up at the ends for an effect of fluffy fullness. Continue parting, brushing, parting until you have finished both sides. When you re-arrange your hair-do, you'll seem to have twice as much and three times better-behaved hair.

However, you can't fake length without some assistance. What you can do is add on and fill out with matching pieces. These are made of natural hair, exactly the same shade as your own and come in lovely chignon effects, coiled or twisted to simulate full-length luxuriance. Such hair pieces are as easy to put on as a bow or a flower. They are simply attached with invisible, non-slipping combs to hug your head in a sturdy, steadfast way.

Kaye's a many-sided sort of guy, come to think of it. And probably that's what makes him so interesting and fascinating. There's, for instance, Kaye the Athlete. As most people know, he's baseball mad. Greatest Dodger fan in the world, he's a bosom pal of Leo the Lip Durocher, the Brooklyn manager. Once Leo asked him to work out with the team, in uniform! (Even the Goldwyn kiss of fortune couldn't mean as much to Danny.)

Almost everywhere that Danny goes he takes two gloves and a baseball. (They barred those weapons from backstage of "Let's Face It," after casualties.) Danny invites everybody to play catch. And if he doesn't work off his baseballitis elsewhere, he brings it home. There's a 60-by-60 plot behind our house (Danny insists on calling it "the backyard"). On the little strip of green between the pint-sized swimming pool and the kitchen door, Mrs. Kaye, when Danny has time off, plays catch with him. Though I weigh only 111 pounds, I've learned to catch all Mr. Steelmuscled Kaye can send.

An English airman, son of a famous London publisher, was asked by reporters, as he sailed home from New York, "What do you remember best that you saw in America?" He answered, "Danny Kaye's muscle." It was a good gag, because if Danny knows you thirty minutes he's likely to say, "Feel my muscle!"

He is whipcord and steel from head to foot. His pride in that, and in his perfect coordination (he achieved "form" almost at once in the little golf and tennis he has had time to play—and he sleeps in Ballet Position No. 3) stems from a very human reason. When he was fifteen, he was injured seriously in an automobile accident. Then later, working in summer-camp shows for bare eating-money, another injury.

I'd handed him two new numbers, one night, both of which required violent and lightning-like contortions. During the first, at the show's very opening, Danny took an unscheduled fall—hard. The audience howled, thinking it was funny, and the rest of us didn't pay much attention. But an hour and a half later, when Danny didn't come out for the final curtain calls, we found him backstage, passed out cold.

He had fractured a vertebra in that fall, gone through the long show afterward on sheer nerve. As a matter of fact, he still requires frequent back massages when undergoing a heavy schedule, and doesn't always work without pain.

But Athlete Kaye isn't the only one of Danny's personalities that overflows into the home. There's Frustrated Actor Kaye! Not that he wants to play Hamlet, but he has a wild passion to do character parts. Is so sure that he could, and to prove his point . . .

Danny worked sixty-four days in "Up in Arms," with a total of only four days off. Once, though, he was unexpectedly let go for the afternoon at 3 o'clock. After spending an hour with the make-up expert of "The North Star," Danny arrived home, set to test his powers.

Unfortunately, I heard his steps on the stairs, and no one could disguise from me that bouyant and rhythmic stride. So when the maid phoned me frantically from downstairs that "a terrible looking old man" had come in and was on the way up, I answered, "Don't worry!"

Then Danny appeared, a white-haired Russian peasant. And not one thing about the way he stood, the slope of his shoulders, his face or his voice betrayed Danny Kaye!

We learned next day of an hilarious pay-off on that stunt. Down the street from us lives Max Liebman, who collaborates with me on writing Danny's numbers. Danny, coming home, had stopped off to show Max his Russian make-up. Sitting in a car outside, waiting to take Max somewhere, was Joe Schrank, a Metro writer. Joe saw a car pull up just in front of him. The car door didn't open, but over the door, feet and long legs first, eeled a tall figure. A Russian peasant, obviously at least seventy years old. The old man bounded up Max's front steps with the lightness of Pavlowa, and Joe remarked wonderingly to his wife that night: "Those Russians are marvelous. I wonder what they eat. I'll have to find out!"

So Danny had fooled somebody.

How could life be dull with such a man? You ought to watch him, for instance, when he listens to classical music. He will be motionless, quiet for a few minutes; then you'll see, from his face, that he's acting out in his mind the various instruments. Two more minutes, and he'll be living what he thinks the composer is saying.

Danny will take any kind of professional criticism—personal criticism he just doesn't hear. He's full of contrasts like that. He'll listen till five o'clock in the morning, quiet and drinking it all in, to anyone on any subject—if the talker is a real expert. But let some intellectual phony begin to hold forth and Danny will spot the phonies at once and say, in the midst of any nice after-dinner party, "Hon, let's go home."

I've learned one thing, too, that may be of help to other young wives. If Danny is half an hour, or even an hour late for dinner, I never ask him where he's been. (He loves people, loves to stop and talk, to sit and chin.) Likewise on his rare moody days—he has them—he may sit around the house for several hours, not reading, not even talking. Then he'll say, "I'm going out awhile." I never ask him where. He would tell me, if I did, but he appreciates my not asking him.

No man likes to feel that his household, even when "household" means only his wife, is reaching out after him everywhere he goes, like a pair of outstretched claws. Or, to change the metaphor, like an overhanging shed, with barbed-wire questions to keep him from ever getting free out into the world. The Kaye home will never become a concentration camp, and my lack of curiosity involves no sacrifice and no worry. Why? The wife in me has to come out, I guess—because, Danny is a sweet and good person!

Keep backing em up with War Bonds

There's a day coming when you'll want to stand up and cheer the greatest victory in history.

But let's not start cheering yet

In fact, let's not start it at all—over here. Let's leave it to the fellows who are doing the job—to begin the celebrating.

Let's keep bearing down till we get the news of final victory from the only place such news can come: the battleline.

If we do that, we'll have the right to join the cheering when the time comes.

camps, sold bonds, appeared at dozens of patriotic rallies. However, she was never away from the children longer than two consecutive months.

But you can't run away from troubles. They pick up their legs and go right along. Her absence didn't improve the home situation. And she continued to brood. And she was still tied into knots.

She made "Cry Havoc" at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Then shortly after completing the picture she received an offer from Producer Mike Todd to return to the Broadway stage in "The Naked Genius." Dick urged her to accept it. For Joan, it was a reprieve.

At Dick's suggestion, and with his complete knowledge and approval, she accepted Mike's escort frequently. They dined together. They danced together. They were friends.

"The Naked Genius" was still playing after six weeks, when the show closed due to Joan's illness. She returned to Hollywood and spent ten weeks in bed.

It was during those weeks of physical wretchedness and complete heartsickness that she faced the issue squarely

"I'm sticking because of my children," she told herself. "But what good am I to them, in this condition? What good can a sick, maladjusted mother be to them? They are entitled to a healthy mother, mentally poised and balanced."

It wasn't easy. Again and again her mind beat against doubts and fears. She had only one question to answer —"What is best for my children?" When she left Hollywood to go into the road company of "Something for the Boys," she still had not reached a final decision.

In Chicago, she collapsed again. The enormous mental tension imposed by her indecision sapped every bit of her reserve energy. But before she arrived on the Coast she had crossed her Rubicon. She would seek a divorce.

Once she reached the inevitable conclusion, her health began to improve. Her nerves were no longer wire springs pulling at her body.

Today, Joan says: "I have a sense of adjustment, a serenity, a sense of belonging to myself I have never had before. I am getting acquainted with myself for the first time in my life. It's like meeting a stranger, for I have invariably patterned myself to what someone else wanted or expected of me. I, as a person, have never really counted.

"I find myself suddenly oriented. In trying not to look closely at painful personal problems, I developed a sort of mental blindness. For many years I have seen nothing. Now, I see a certain tree in the yard. I see my dog. I see the color of the eyes of my friends. They've always been there—but they've never penetrated to my inner vision.

"I am aware of things and people. I can look closely at everything around me and see them in focus. I have learned to listen and really to hear what is being said. It seems as if all my senses had been swathed in deadening wool—and all sounds and impressions came from a very great distance, and everything was distorted. Now I see and hear and feel, sharply and clearly and truly. I am all different and made over inside.

"I am not afraid of anything any more. I know that I can be true to myself and still fulfill all my responsibilities to my children. My new five-year contract with Twentieth-Century-Fox will enable me to provide for them well. After all, money isn't tremendously important. If I teach them humility, and how to live intelligently, they will have inner resources far more useful than mere material things when they come in contact with the world.

"My chief concern during all the trying weeks of finally cutting the threads of our mutual lives has been the effect of the break on the children. Ellen, who is six, is too young to understand or be touched by the situation. She is accustomed to her father's absences. He has been away from home before—on location, on personal appearances, on business trips. It isn't as if she had seen him day in and day out all her life.

"But Normie is old enough to understand. I explained to him as much as was possible. I was cold with fear while I told him what was happening. But he put his arms around me, and said: 'Mother, that's the way things are, and don't you cry inside yourself any more.' Children have far more wisdom and perception than we think.

"I have always preserved and guarded their pride in their father. I shall continue to do so. I want no unhappiness to reflect on them. I don't want them to be conscious of sorrow or loss. And I have been able to keep them from it."

There must always be a poignant sense of loss, of defeat for any woman when her marriage ends. No matter how necessary it is. No matter the conditions. But the final weeks of arrangements and conferences have been eased for Joan by her complete absorption in the role of Cissy.

Joan's new contract calls for three pictures a year. She has the privilege of doing a play, and her screen schedule will be adjusted to make it possible when she finds one she wants to do.

Insofar as anyone can predict the future—subject as it must be to a woman's heart and to a woman's loneliness—Joan predicts single-blessedness for herself for the next five years.

"I want to be free for five years," she declares. "I want to be myself. I want to know myself.

"Then I want to marry again, for that is the only truly satisfying state for the normal woman. I want my home, my children, my man. I think I'll make a good wife, for I have learned a lot through unhappiness—as all of us do.

"Mind you, I am discounting the effects of a moon, a spring, perhaps a state of mind which might cut down that period to a year or two or three.

"This I want to make clear—no other emotional interest crystallized my decision to seek a divorce. It is my opinion that no one can break up a happy home. No outsider can come between a man and a woman secure in their love. There has to be something basically wrong within the marriage itself to make it dissolve or break."

Yes, Joan Blondell is beginning a fresh, new life. And she has the vision, the self-understanding to make it that completely!

FAYE EMERSON

William Emery Shepherd, head of the drama institute at Point Loma.

"He gave me my first opportunity," she says. "He personally steered me through my initial role on the stage—in a play called 'Saint Cecilia.' It was religious in character—quite a contrast to my first film role, which was in a rootin' tootin' shootin' western epic titled 'Bad Man of Missouri.'"

Faye loves all music, and has collected enough popular and symphonic albums to stock a record shop. But—she can't sing a note, and consistently muffs "Chopsticks" on the piano. (She was a song leader, though. Remember?)

She paints and sketches extremely well and is inordinately proud of a self-portrait she did a couple of years back and then gave away to someone who admired it.

Faye has no pet economies but lists her favorite extravagance as buying hats, which she never wears. "But they are wonderful, aren't they?" is her comment.

She likes to swim. In fact Faye excels so at this sport that she was a runner-up in the swimming tryouts for the Olympic games one year. She bicycles and bowls. She loathes prize fights, but is an inveterate football and basketball fan.

"My prize indoor sport," she says, "is poker—but how many times do I get to play it? Once every two years! So what happens? I play gin rummy like a fiend, and I'm learning to play backgammon."

Her favorite authors are Steinbeck, Maugham, Hervey Allen, Saroyan—and Louisa May Alcott.

She shares a black Ford convertible, vintage '41, with her three dogs and two cats. "Sounds like a wild animal act on wheels when I go down Hollywood Blvd., but I love it," she says.

She collects old and rare handkerchiefs, an unusual diversion, and prizes highly a lacy bit of fluff once carried by the Divine Sarah (Sarah Bernhardt).

She is superstitious about "three on a match," and for luck totes around a Navajo key ring complete with a rabbit's foot, given her by her mother.

As to her physical attributes, she is, to quote her, an "undetermined brunette or blonde." What she means is that she hasn't quite made up her mind exactly what coloring she does prefer. (At the moment she is definitely blonde!) She has big, dark brown eyes, and a very fair, clear skin that takes a golden tan. She seldom wears her hair in the same style two days in succession, except after she has begun a picture.

"Character" has a hundred ambitions: To be a Bette Davis, for one thing. Strangely enough, it was this top Warner star who first seemed aware of Faye's acting ability. One day Miss Davis, on her way to see "rushes," went into the wrong projection room by mistake. She found herself looking at a test in which Miss Emerson was assisting. Her interest immediately aroused, she saw the test through, then sought information about Faye. Learning that Faye had been under contract for some time, she said, "But why aren't they doing something with her? That girl has more talent in her little finger than half the name stars in Hollywood. Where can I see her? I want to talk to her. Maybe I can do something for her."

But "Character," true to her acquired name, got cold feet over the meeting. Every time she approached Miss Davis' dressing room, she began to shake all over. It was no use. She has never been able to talk about herself to her ideal—though she has since met her many times.

She would like to take an active part in local, state and national politics. And speaking of politics, Faye says, "One thing that really burns me are the people who argue politics day in and day out and never go to the polls to vote!"

She'd like to be a ballet dancer.

To be a writer. She would haunt newspaper editorial offices if she weren't under contract to Warner Brothers.

To be a rancher and go in for cat-

To People who want to write

but can't get started

Do you have that constant urge to write but the fear that a beginner hasn't a chance? Then listen to what the editor of Liberty said on this subject:

> "There is more room for newcomers in the writing field today than ever before. Some of the greatest of writing men and women have passed from the scene in recent years. Who will take their places? Who will be the new Robert W. Chambers, Edgar Wallace, Rudyard Kipling? It is also true that more people are trying to write than ever before, but talent is still rare and the writer still must learn his craft, as few of the newcomers nowadays seem willing to do. Fame, riches and the happiness of achievement await the new men and women of power."

Army Wife Wins Writing Success After 2 Months' Training

"I am an army wife who followed her husband South to his military post. Two months after enrolling for N.I.A. training, I acquired a position as a reporter on the Columbus Enquirer. In four months, I have had two raises. Also I have over 75 'bylines' to my credit, and the prospects of becoming City Editor look very promising."—Mrs. Marion M. Blondel, Columbus, Georgia.

NEWSPAPER Institute of America offers a free Writing Aptitude Test. Its object is to discover new recruits for the army of men and women who add to their income by fiction and article writing. The Writing Aptitude Test is a simple but expert analysis of your latent ability, your powers of imagination, logic, etc. Not all applicants pass this test. Those who do are qualified to take the famous N. I. A. course based on the practical training given by big metropolitan dailies.

This is the New York Copy Desk Method which teaches you to write by writing! You develop your individual style instead of trying to copy that of others. You "cover" actual assignments such as metropolitan reporters get. Although you work at home, on your own time, you are constantly guided by experienced writers. It is really fascinating work. Each week you see new progress. In a matter of months you can acquire the coveted "professional" touch. Then you're ready for market with greatly improved chances of making sales.

the raising on a paying basis. She could do it, too. She's a rousing good rider, cowboy style. She can keep a set of books and curb her expenditures to such an extent, her accounts never see red. And she can cook! Though she claims she isn't interested in food, she's like a bombshell exploding when she raptures over a dish she tasted the night before.

She's determined to organize a little theatre group based on a cooperative plan for talent not blessed with helpings from papa's money bags. Faye has already completed details on paper, and architect's plans of the little theatre are under way. As soon as the war permits building, Faye will see this through. It has been a long-lived dream with her.

As for her own acting career, she says, "I'd like to be shoved into a good comedy role. I'd love to be a zany comedienne—like Joan Davis, or a female Harpo Marx." Faye is a natural comic, has wowed servicemen at camp shows with her routines. The Brothers Warner will be overlooking a great bet if they miss this side of the many personalized "Character."

Faye was formerly married to William W. Crawford II—and has a four-year-old son with a III after his name, but fondly called "Scoop" by his mother. ("Scoop" because he usually beats her to the punch.)

She lives in Brentwood in a large house which she leases. Faye chose the place because it was near the beach. Both she and "Scoop" love to swim. But now "Scoop" lives with Faye's mother in San Diego—and there is the problem of gas rationing—so Faye would like to rent an apartment in Hollywood. "But," she shrugs, "you can't even rent a closet these days! So I budget my gas, too, and share rides."

If she should fortunately find an apartment, though, there would be several unhappy San Diego couples on Sundays. Sunday is Faye's "day at home." It is also her San Diego friends' "day at Character's."

When Faye gets up on Sunday, the first thing she does is to go to the spare bedrooms and see what guests she has on hand. Though she may have been out late Saturday night, the maid's instructions are to open the house to her friends.

Breakfast is a free-for-all, with everyone fixing his own. With the result that there are always five or six different kinds of breakfast on Sunday. After breakfast, come the funnies—a must-do.

Then they go to the beach for a swim, regardless of the weather. It's never too wet for Faye—she'll go swimming when it rains. Usually when they return to the house, there are other guests who have dropped in. All of her friends know they are welcome on Sunday. They make their own entertainment, playing cards, games and records.

"I never have dinner at the house on Sunday," explains Faye, "because people don't always know when to stop having fun. I have to be in bed early to get to work Monday morning." So out to dinner she goes, with whomever wishes to join her. She always has steak, a baked potato and a green salad for Sunday dinner.

Yes, she's unusual. She's new; she's different.

Watch out for this Emerson gal. Come in and call—for—"Character!"

LIGHTS, ACTION, CAMERA!

pitch. Today, the sound man also plays detective, having to ferret out all the objectionable noises and put a stop to them. Sometimes it's the crinkling of a Celanese slip that sounds like a waterfall in the recording booth, or a loose heel that sounds like machine gun fire and has to be padded with felt, or the whispering of a careless extra.

And who makes the rain fall, who plans the earthquakes and explosions? Those are jobs for the arsenal and special effects department. Hardly a day passes when they aren't busy setting fire to a 2000-acre forest, wiping out an entire town with floods, or drowning a whole regiment of Nazi soldiers.

And when bombs drop, roofs fly off buildings, horses charge, and tanks attack, in the topical pictures of today, it is not unusual that someone is hurt. In a crowd of several thousand extras, there is no more useful member of a production unit than the pretty nurse over at the doctor's building. In a single picture it is not unusual for her to be kept on her toes extracting splinters from a damaged hand, removing particles of dust from a star's eyes, bandaging a cut toe, or applying ice packs to a bleeding nose. For major cases, she can call an ambulance and have it on the spot in three minutes.

Thinking of the prop department's job, has it occurred to you that there are several subdivisions of the work? For example, there's the man who handles the money. "Prop money," it's called, because it isn't real. Other than the Mexican dollars used, the paper money is all counterfeit. Even so, it's quite a responsibility to be prepared to supply any amount, extending into the millions, and make sure that it's always safely returned.

In the jewelry section of the small props department is a stock valued in the hundreds of thousands. Wedding rings and engagement rings—enough at 20th Century-Fox studio alone to occupy 110 ministers for three weeks.

Such valuables need protection though, of course. And that's a job for the studio cop. Besides which, he has extras coming to him who've forgotten their handbags or wallets and need carfare to get home; he has visiting celebrities to direct around the studio, law and order to keep.

But probably the most unique of all is the job of the cobweb-constructor. The expert who manufactures artificial cobwebs of Latex and blows them into position by means of a spray gun. Good for only twenty-four hours, the webs then have to be replaced, for they grow fuzzy, wilt and droop with sudden age. When they look old they don't photograph well.

Meanwhile, the make-up department has the job of creating disguises. They're always being confronted with what's seemingly the impossible—reconstructing as many as ninety-six historical characters for one picture alone. According to Guy Pearce, head of the Twentieth Century-Fox make-up department, the hardest task he ever had was to make young Alexander Knox look like old Woodrow Wilson. But miracles being part of his everyday chores, he wasn't even stumped with that one.

Giving you an idea why picture-making is so expensive, too, creation of the lavish wardrobe for the five main principals of the $4,000,000 Technicolor production of "Wilson" required no less than 179 different outfits. And because all five of the women were fashion leaders in their day, each individual gown had to have allure and distinction. It cost $31,000 to dress the second Mrs. Wilson, played by lovely Geraldine Fitzgerald, and the entire wardrobe bill for the picture was $200,000.

All so that the movie-going public will have characters that are convincing, scenes that are real, productions that are perfect. And without these people — the prop-man, the studio nurse, the make-up genius, the sound expert, the script girl, the special effects wizard, wardrobe mistress, and all the rest—the wheels wouldn't turn. For each is a small gear, meshing with the rest and becoming the tremendous machine that is a complete motion-picture unit.

NEW PICTURE GUIDE

SECRETS OF SCOTLAND YARD (Republic) classifies as a good old "whodunit," with Scotland Yard finding the answer, and is bristling with Nazis from beginning to end. However tired the theme may be, the movie is well done, is suspenseful, and actually does keep you guessing.

Such veteran performers as C. Aubrey Smith, Henry Stephenson and Lionel Atwill lend fine support to Edgar Barrier and Stephanie Bachelor as the leads and love interest.

The plot revolves around Room 40, where British intelligence decodes German messages. This same Room 40 was so effective in the last war that this time the Nazis plant one of their agents in the room itself. There are a couple murders thrown in, and if you can guess the culprit's identity before the climax, we are Sherlock Holmes, Inc.

JUNGLE WOMAN (Universal) Don't let the title fool you—it's sans sarongs, but completely! The "jungle woman" is actually Acquanetta, who spends half her time as a respectable feminine citizen, and the other half as a murderous ape. The picture picks up where "Captive Wild Woman" left off, following the further adventures of our half-and-half heroine.

In this sequel, she returns, in human form, and falls in love with the doctor's son. The son has a fiancée, who naturally is in for it, what with Acquanetta's glaring at her from dark corners. After crushing a few sundry people, the ape woman goes after her rival.

But despite the implausible story, the film is well handled, and if you go for these spine chillers, you'll like it.

THE HEART OF A NATION— Made in Paris, this picture was finished just three days before the Nazis marched into the city. Prints of the film were seized and destroyed, but producer Paul Graetz managed to save one print and had it buried in a farmer's garden. There it stayed for more than a year, when it was slowly smuggled out of France, a reel at a time.

In view of the fact that Hitler ordered it destroyed, it is interesting to note what is considered dangerous by Mr. Shicklegruber. It is an unpretentious film depicting the life of a French family through three generations. There is nothing in it to endanger Nazi principles, except the fact that France is invaded by Germany in each generation.

The stars are Michele Morgan and the famous French comedian, Raimu, who starred in "The Baker's Wife." English titles are supplied, and Charles Boyer is interpolator throughout. It does not come up to the usual standard of French motion pictures, yet it is indicative of French family life, and of particular interest because of the story connected with the film.

"VITAMIN LACK CAN CAUSE HAIR TO TURN GRAY" SAYS MODERN SCIENCE

Can this 2-Way VITAMIN DISCOVERY RESTORE NATURAL COLOR to Your GRAY or GRAYING HAIR?

New Test So Easy... It's Amazing!

If your hair is gray, graying, streaked or off-color due to vitamin deficiency, this test of the original PANATES double-action VITAMIN treatment offers you amazing new hope! You have read about the scientific vitamin tests that, while too recent for conclusive evidence, have shown startling signs of results. It has been proven beyond doubt that a lack of certain vitamins in the daily diet may be a contributing cause for hair to lose its natural color and turn gray. Simply by improving your diet and by taking the harmless, concentrated food vitamins in PANATES each day, you may check the gray spread . . . you may actually see gray, old-looking, streaked, fading hair change back at the roots, temples and parting to normal, original color, natural color! But first let me tell you what the original PANATES double-action vitamin method is, how PANATES differs so drastically from other anti-gray hair vitamins and why so many of the thousands of women and men who once accepted PANATES on the same trial offer now continue with it because of the amazing change in hair color they testify as taking place before their very eyes!

No Matter
What Shade Your Natural Hair Color
May Be.. Black, Brown,
Auburn or Blonde . .

Make This Convincing Test

Panates Is NOT A HAIR DYE

Nothing to Fear—No Mess, No Fuss

Panates supply not only the "anti-gray" hair vitamins, but give you the "staff of life" wheat germ oil (Vitamin E) as well. Absolutely harmless, Panates actually is a healthful food supplement. Panates gives your system a source for the hair color vitamins that may be lacking in your daily diet and, if so, should literally feed natural color into the hair roots to check gray spread, to help the hair to new, lively lustre and to bring new hope for restoration of normal hair color once again.

Panates isn't a hair dye. Panates is the natural way to seek natural hair color. You can test Panates whether you now artificially color your hair or not, because Panates "Anti-Gray" Hair Vitamins with Wheat Germ Oil Vitamin E, feeds your system from within.

If you now dye your hair, you may notice you need less and less artificial hair color. If your hair is just starting to turn gray, you may notice the graying process is checked and soon the gray strands may be less and less pronounced. That's one of the wonderful things about the "anti-gray hair" vitamins in Panates . . . the action is natural. No one need know you are doing a single thing for your hair. And ladies, Panates will not hurt or interfere with permanents.

When Restored Color Shows, It's Natural Color

No matter what your normal hair color might be, before graying due to vitamin lack, no matter what shade of black, brown, auburn or blonde, if you see signs of hair color restoration, you will be amazed to note that the new color is the original, normal color of your natural hair.

This Trial Offer Is Fair and It Calls For Immediate Acceptance

Is your gray or graying hair due to deficiency in the very vitamins in Panates? We bring you a very fair money-back coupon offer that certainly makes it easy for you to test the Panates treatment yourself to see what Panates two vitamins may do for you in your fight for the happiness of lovely-looking, natural hair color beauty. You take no chances. You can test Panates in the confidence these vitamins are taken daily by countless thousands the nation over. Only daring women bobbed their hair. People cranked cars by hand...sang "Over There". Women in suffrage parades. It was 1918 and army hospitals in France, desperately short of cotton for surgical dressings, welcomed a new American invention, Cellucotton* Absorbent. Nurses started using it for sanitary pads. Thus started the Kotex idea, destined to bring new freedom to women.

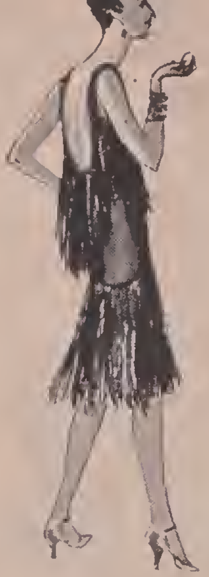
Stockings were black or white. Flappers wore open galoshes. Valentino played "The Sheik". People boasted about their radios . . . crystal sets with earphones. And women were talking about the new idea in personal hygiene —disposable Kotex* sanitary napkins, truly hygienic, comfortable. Women by the millions welcomed this new product, advertised in 1921 at 60¢ per dozen.



Courtesy Vogue

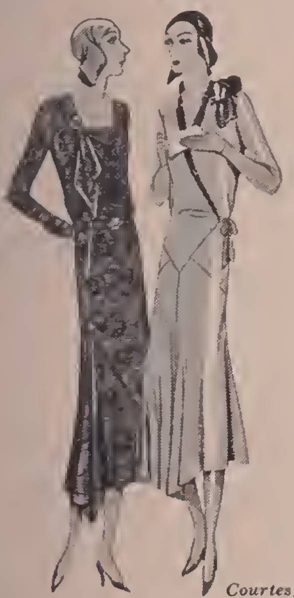
Waistlines and hemlines nearly got together. Red nail polish was daring. "The Desert Song". Slave bracelets. The year was 1926 when women by the millions silently paid a clerk as they picked up a "ready wrapped" package of Kotex. The pad was now made narrower; gauze was softened to increase comfort. New rounded ends replaced the original square corners.



Courtesy McCall's

Platinum Blondes and miniature golf were the rage. Skirts dripped uneven hemlines... began to cling more closely. Could sanitary napkins be made invisible under the close-fitting skirts of 1930? Again Kotex pioneered . . . perfected flat, pressed ends. Only Kotex, of all leading brands, offers this patented feature—ends that don't show because they are not stubby—do not cause telltale lines.

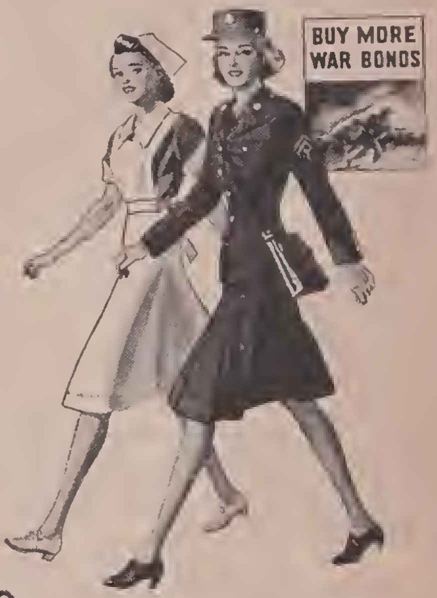
19___

Debutantes danced the Big Apple. "Gone With the Wind" a best seller. An American woman married the ex-King of England. And a Consumers' Testing Board of 600 women was enthusiastic about Kotex improvements in 1937. A double-duty safety center which prevents roping and twisting . . . increases protection by hours. And fluffy Wondersoft edges for a new high in softness!



19___

Service rules today. Clothes of milk, shoes of glass, yet Cellucotton Absorbent is still preferred by leading hospitals. Still in Kotex, too, choice of more women than all other brands put together. For Kotex is made for service—made to stay soft in use. None of that snowball sort of softness that packs hard under pressure. And no wrong side to cause accidents! Today's best-buy—22¢.

The greatest star of the screen!

All through 1944 it is the Twenty-Year Anniversary of M-G-M. In one recent week 16,449 theatre-owners—every movie house in these U.S.A.—showed an M-G-M picture.

★ ★ ★ ★

We bow, we blush, we thank you, kind motion picture showmen. The best way to show our gratitude is to continue to deliver satisfying hits as in the past.

Two great films await your attentive eyes and ears—"An American Romance" and "Mrs. Parkington".

★ ★ ★ ★

Of "An American Romance", King Vidor's great epic of our soil, you have heard great praise. Watch for it while we pause to impress you with a current triumph.

★ ★ ★ ★

"Mrs. Parkington".

★ ★ ★ ★

Or, rather, Greer Garson and Walter Pidgeon in "Mrs. Parkington".

★ ★ ★ ★

This excellent film is a superb adaptation of Louis Bromfield's best-selling novel and gives that talented pair a vehicle that is more than a vehicle.

★ ★ ★ ★

Many of our screen artists have looks, many can act, many have personality. Greer Garson is a triple threat. And "Mrs. P." gives her the chance to prove it again.

★ ★ ★ ★

Her deft transition from the naive daughter of a mining-camp boarding-house proprietor to a dynamic cosmopolite is one for the book. Or better still, one for the screen.

★ ★ ★ ★

Greer's "Susie" finds an excellent dovetail in the "Major Augustus Parkington" as played by Walter Pidgeon. Ruthless, dashing and with a roving-eye.

★ ★ ★ ★

The dream-like cast includes such stars as Edward Arnold, Agnes Moorehead, Gladys Cooper, Frances Rafferty, Tom Drake, Selena Royle.

★ ★ ★ ★

Tay Garnett, director of "Bataan", has also performed brilliantly — with the megaphone.

We suggest you park yourself in a seat at "Mrs. Parkington".

AS WE GO TO PRESS

Mickey Rooney, in G.I.s, is bucking for corporal.

Maureen O'Hara has named her new daughter Bronwen FitzSimons Price.

Sergeant and Mrs. Glenn Ford (Eleanor Powell) have announced their anticipated parenthood for January, 1945.

No plans have been made for a divorce (nor even a legal separation), but Ida Lupino and Capt. Louis Hayward are "living apart."

Major Clark Gable, back in civies and looking terrific, is doing the night spots with fragile, blonde Kay Williams.

WHOLESOME TYPE:

A national columnist recently suggested in print that Van Johnson and June Allyson had eloped. The two most astounded persons to read this scoop were Van Johnson and June Allyson. Reasons: On Monday night preceding the announcement, June had gone dancing with Dick Powell. On the previous Wednesday night she had been the dinner guest of John Hodiak. On the previous Friday noon she had enjoyed luncheon with Hurd Hatfield. Not for months had she and Van (good friends but not breathless about it) been out on a date together.

Incidentally, about two-thirds of June's service fan mail comes from Air Corps personnel who pay her a repeated compliment. "You are," they say, "such a wholesome type."

SPARE TIME:

When Lon McCallister was ordered by the army to report to a camp in Santa Monica, preparatory to working in the army show "Winged Victory" being filmed at 20th Century Fox, he uttered a whoop of delight and began to make plans during those scrimped moments of privacy that a G.I. Joe has between K.P. and the obstacle course.

Santa Monica is only a few miles from the home that Lon bought for his family last fall. Since the house was purchased, the McCallisters have gone about the job of furnishing in a most realistic manner. The living room was decorated first, in a smart and comfortable manner; Lon's mother and grandmother made all the drapes; they prowled through out-of-the-way shops for odd bits of furniture and antique accessories. But the bedrooms were equipped only with cots, until such time as satisfactory furniture could be secured.

So, the first Sunday Lon was allowed to go home, he rampaged into the house, inspected everything and shouted approval. Next, he shed his G.I.s in favor of a pair of tired dungarees, a sweat shirt and a pair of sneakers. He had brought home a can of paint and a set of brushes, and he promptly went to work.

Frankie Sinatra is currently being verbally spanked by a number of local columnists who think The Voice has gone into its uppermost High Hat register. The truth of the matter is that he DID walk off the set in a huff during the filming of "Step Lively" at RKO; and he did tell one of the most important local writers that the writer would have to make an appointment—on the set, no less—before Frankie could spare a few moments to talk with the man who represents a national radio program and a newspaper syndicate.

This column has never squealed nor swooned, but it is still a fan of Frankie's, so hereby offers an opinion: there is nothing wrong with Mr. Sinatra that fourteen nights, consisting of ten hours of sleep each would not cure. He is harassed, beset, exhausted, clamored for and at, and generally subjected to wear and tear that would reduce a General Sherman tank to rubble. Let's give the poor guy a break.

"How mother clings to habits already formed"

HER mother is a marvelous mother, but a little inclined to cling to habits already formed. If her mind were just a shade younger, how much better she could understand her daughter's modern point of view . . . Take the subject of monthly sanitary protection, for instance, and the use of Tampax. Here the mother might well learn from the daughter, both being of "Tampax age."

Isn't it worth a good deal to you to be free from the harness of belts, pins and pads? Then try Tampax, which is worn internally. No odor, no chafing, no bulges, no sanitary deodorant. Quick changing. Easy disposal. Originated and perfected by a doctor, the wearer does not even feel it . . . Pure surgical cotton . . . Dainty patented applicator for quick and easy insertion.

NEW PICTURE GUIDE

AN AMERICAN ROMANCE (M-G-M) was originally to be called simply "America"—which, although a presumptuous title for a motion picture, is exactly what the film tries to portray.

It is a fine and sensitive thing, depicting through the life of one immigrant to our shores, the opportunities afforded in America to any man who has the wish and the determination to achieve success.

As Steve Dangos, Brian Donlevy gives the outstanding performance of his career. Dangos is a Slovenian immigrant who comes to America in 1898, and walks a thousand miles to work in the iron mines of Minnesota. He meets a young school teacher (the new Ann Richards) who helps him in his search for knowledge. They marry and have a family—a big one—with Steve never losing sight of the fact that one of his sons can become President.

Through the years, he becomes a wealthy man, and current times find him manufacturing airplanes for the war.

Attempting so much—to tell the story of America, and to give the whole saga of the American steel industry, from the conversion of iron ore into steel, and from steel-making to the manufacturing and assembling of automobiles and airplanes—it's all but inevitable that the picture result is overlong. Which it is.

BATHING BEAUTY (M-G-M), a starring vehicle for Esther Williams (her first) gets our vote as being one of the best musicals so far this year. With Harry James, Helen Forrest, Xavier Cugat, Lina Romay, Carlos Rameriz—and Ethel Smith, formerly the "Hit Parade" organist, doing some fine and fancy demonstrations on the keys.

Red Skelton, in the male lead, shows up for the first time in his film career as a likeable—and believable—guy. No slapstick, no mugging.

For the plot, Red marries Esther early in the film, but through a misunderstanding Esther becomes the indignant wife and leaves Red to go back to her position as teacher in a girl's school. Red follows in pursuit—and his appearing as the only male student in the school, makes for a whole series of hilarious situations.

He sticks it out, though, until his love life is straightened out and all is happy once more.

The finale is a grand scale production in itself, with Esther showing fine form (two kinds) in a colorful water pageant, aided by scores of able and graceful mermaids.

Take the whole family, and settle down for an evening of magnificent entertainment.

ABROAD WITH TWO YANKS (Edward Small-U.A.) is strictly from slapstick, but chock-full of laughs.

The plot is the well worn one about the two buddies, this time in the Marine Corps, who go all out for the same girl, and in doing so, break about every existent rule in the Corps.

Bill Bendix is the quiet soul, loving poetry and the finer things of life, who tangles with Dennis O'Keefe, a wolf of the first water, for the affections of Helen Walker.

O'Keefe shows a definite ability for comedy, and Bendix is fine as the stolid citizen. Their antics are rib-tickling from beginning to end, particularly when they're dressed as women. Bendix in satin, lipstick and a wig, yet!

The picture is light and fluffy, and filled with corn, but well done and amusing.

WING AND A PRAYER (20th Century-Fox) is the story of an aircraft carrier and the men who manned it—heroes, every one. Tragic, in that the whole strategic plan of the American Navy, in preparing an offensive attack in the Pacific, was dependent on the mission assigned this one carrier. A mission necessarily kept secret, even from the men themselves.

Save for the carrier captain (Charles Bickford) and the air officer in charge of flight operations (Don Ameche), no one could know that in seeming to flee before the enemy—to refuse combat, even when their refusal was costly in terms of lives and equipment—actually they were setting a trap, preparing a more important victory.

Sharing honors for making this a likely nomination as one of the most real, and the most vivid, pictures to come out of the war are Dana Andrews, as the squadron commander; Richard Jaeckel, Kevin O'Shea, Richard Crane, Reed Hadley, William Eythe, Murry Alper, B. S. Pully, and George Mathews.

THE IMPATIENT YEARS (Columbia) is the intriguing title for Columbia's newest Jean Arthur vehicle—the story of a wartime marriage in which husband and wife are "just like strangers."

It's comedy with a liberal dash of pathos, with husband returning after a year and a half overseas, to wife (with whom he'd lived only four days) and his infant son.

Wife Janie (Jean Arthur) lives by a schedule now. The stars in her eyes are gone. Husband Andy (Lee Bowman) hasn't yet pulled his feet out of the clouds he's been fighting in. No happy medium presents itself—so, they make the trek to the divorce court.

The judge, upon the advice of Janie's always helpful father (Charles Coburn), refuses to grant the divorce until the couple re-enact their original four days together in San Francisco.

Here's a case of "if I had it to do all over again" coming true! And it's fun to watch what happens as Janie and Andy reluctantly retrace their meeting, their courtship, wedding and honeymoon.

A slap-happy situation, tagged with a happy ending. And you'll like it.

MR. WINKLE GOES TO WAR (Columbia) The title may mislead you—but this isn't the usual type of war picture. Mr. Winkle (Edward G. Robinson) is a 44-year-old bank clerk, drafted into the army at the beginning of the war. In civilian life he has been a retiring little man, wrapped up in miles of figures at the bank, and just before he receives his draft board tidings, he has taken the bull by the horn, quit his job, and made up his mind to make a living at his hobby—which is "fixing things."

You'll laugh at the trials of the corpulent middle-ager going through the rigorous training at camp, at his consternation when he is given desk work because of his bank experience. Mr. Winkle eventually becomes a good soldier, leaves his aches and pains and pills behind, and distinguishes himself on the battlefield.

Ruth Warwick plays Mrs. Winkle, who doesn't understand her husband, and Ted Donaldson the small orphan boy, who does.

This is basically a comedy, and a good one—so don't let any prejudice against war pictures keep you away.

ATLANTIC CITY (Republic) is the story of Brad Taylor (played by Brad Taylor), a young man who knew much of ambition and little of love and friends. His dream is to build Atlantic City into one of the world's gayest playgrounds, and the woman he finds little time to love is Marilyn Whitaker (Constance Moore).

In the process of securing a "nest egg" for the two of them, he almost loses the nest itself.

Louis Armstrong and his band are featured, plus Belle Baker (herself), Van and Schenck (Gus Van and Charles Marsh), and Gallagher and Shean (Jack Kenny and Al Shean).

Starting just prior to World War I, 1915, the story carries through to 1922.

THE MERRY MONAHANS (Universal) They had a good idea for this one, but somehow it doesn't come off. The cast is fine—Donald O'Connor, Peggy Ryan, Jack Oakie, and Ann Blythe—but the picture tries a little too hard to be entertaining.

Oakie and his fiancé have an act,

THE NORMAL Point of View

SHIRLEY COOK
BEAUTY EDITOR

SKIN care, in the movieland manner, is a regular routine, the very same one that you, and you, and I should follow. And the delightful result of such sound and simple skin service is an enviable complexion—the kind so many of the movie maidens have.

Because Mimi Forsythe's skin is the ideal normal, not too dry and not too oily, we went into a huddle with her to get the normal point of view. Here (with the expert prompting of her studio make-up men) is what she has to say

According to Mimi, whom you'll be seeing in the Andrew Stone production "Sensations of 1945," the perfect plan comes in four parts.

No matter what its type, dry, oily or in between, your skin must be kept completely clean. Cream cleansings work most satisfactorily to remove make-up. They melt it off like magic and take the surface grime along. For your soap and water clean-ups, every night and morning, lather with a lavish hand. Work the suds in firmly, especially around nose and chin where blackheads like to lurk. Mimi makes the most of her mild toilet soap by massaging it in for a moment or two. The suds have a longer, better chance to work and the massage furnishes her face with some of its necessary stimulation.

Why so necessary to stimulate the skin? For color and contour, it must be nourished from beneath. That means a method to keep the bloodstream bounding. There are several. Ice or icy water as a splashing final rinse: or the excellent astringents and skin fresheners that make flesh seem firmer, pores seem finer. Once a week or more, a facial mask to put you in the party-going pink.

Softness is essential. And so is the lubricating cream that achieves it. Since an emollient cream soaks into the skin in about fifteen or twenty minutes, you can fit a daily softening session into the busiest schedule. Cream your complexion while you read, bathe or do your nails. Always, last thing before going to bed, stroke it with a film of softener

Once you have a skin that's clear and fine and soft—safeguard it. Use a make-up base to protect your complexion from wind and weather, dirt and dust. You'll find that it not only keeps your skin in condition, but makes it look even smoother, clearer and more colorful than it normally is.

Off with the old! In this case it's stale make-up that Mimi removes—correctly—with cleansing cream.

A thorough soap and water sudsing gets at grime. And the brisk scrub behind it makes for smoother skin.

Skin care in double time. A lubricating face cream is stroked on first, then patted lightly for tone and contour.

Directed by GREGORY RATOFF
Produced by DAMON RUNYON
Screen Play by Earl Baldwin and John Tucker Battle
Based on a story by E. A. Ellington

Joan Crawford

Heeding the old adage, "out of sight, out of mind," few actresses would have the courage to stay off the screen for more than a year, as Joan has done. Her last picture, "Above Suspicion," was made at M-G-M early in 1943. Shortly after, she left Metro to sign a contract with Warner Bros., and has held out all these months until she found a picture that she considered right for her. It will be "Mildred Pearce," in the making at the time you read this.

IT COMES UP MARRIAGE

By BEA LAIRD

ON Sunday, July twenty-third, at five o'clock in the chapel of St. Thomas Episcopal Church, the Reverend Howard joined in Holy Matrimony redheaded Susan Hayward, Hollywood's best portrayer of vixen roles, and Jess Barker, actor, long reported to be the heartthrob of the town.

Pert Susan, playing the role of a demure bride, clad in a torquoise blue frock and with her answers to the holy service softly spoken. Dashing Jess, in a sober suit, answering firmly and seeming to give support to the shaking girl. Does this sound like two sophisticated Hollywood movie greats? We say no! These were two earnest people who knew each other well, who were taking the vows of matrimony for better or for worse in every way that it is meant.

But to bring these two to this flower clad altar you must go back to last November and the setting of the famous Hollywood Canteen. See on the stage dashing Jess Barker, master of ceremonies for the evening. He is introducing such singers as Ginny Simms, for this is the night that Metro players entertain at the Canteen. In the background is Harry James' band, and after Ginny finishes on comes Red Skelton for a half hour turn that makes the boys down front howl with laughter. Over behind the snack bar and frankly standing on a stool is Susan, watching the proceedings. Her work at serving coffee and signing autographs behind the snack bar is through until the show is over, and she wants to see the entertainment.

Suddenly she looks down into the laughing eyes of the master of ceremonies. Jess had taken a brief respite from the stage to come

Robert Lowery figured for a time in the romantic rumors persistent where Susan was concerned, all concocted for her by the columnists. Then like the others, he dropped out of the picture; Jess came back.

Co-starred in Republic's "Hit Parade of 1943," there was heavy betting that wedding bells would eventually ring for Susan and John Carroll.

Here is the love story of movietown's "Number one bachelor," and the gal he married—redheaded Susan Hayward over and meet the beautiful redheaded girl he had seen as he did his announcing.

Theirs was a hectic courtship, with frequent misunderstandings and separations—though you'd never guess it, to see them now. Susan Hayward and Jess Barker, Hollywood's "So very happy" newlyweds!

Banter followed and Susan found herself being invited to share a sandwich with the gentleman after their evening's stint. Drawing her little self up to her full height, she informed him that she didn't go out with men to whom she had not been properly introduced! Right back the gentleman she had never been introduced to said, "Scairdey!"—and she accepted the challenge.

Thus a sandwich turned into dancing at the Mocambo, and they found they danced well together and had fun.

A second Friday night found the same pattern, and then both went to work in a picture. In fact Susan in two—"And Now Tomorrow," at her home studio, Paramount, and "The Hairy Ape" at United Artists.

She was then, as the columnists report, "Bicycling between studios." Each day on the set she received phone calls from Jess or called him on the "Jam Session" set at Columbia. Nightly dinners in a quiet corner of Lucey's restaurant were in order. Not many people noticed this phase of the courtship. Yet it went on, firmly and steadily.

Hollywood's number one bachelor girl was that in name only. Just look back through interviews given out by Susan through her whole career and you will find that she only mentions one man seriously, and that man early in her five-year period in filmtown.

To this day the man is one of her best friends. He did publicity on one of her first pictures, and Susan always referred to him as her "ideal man." She still sees him—and his wife.

Illustrator Jon Whitcomb, now in the service, had been her only other heart interest, and that was way back in her New York days of modeling. They, too, are good friends—and Jon's cable of congratulations from overseas was one of the highlights of Susan's wedding.

Susan went about a bit with this and that eligible Hollywood bachelor, but nothing seemed to come of it. Before she met Jess she was seen steadily with John Carroll, but although the papers reported them engaged, Susan swears it was "just friendship" and we are inclined to believe her.

Career conscious is the word for Susan. She wants to become a top movie star and is adamant that she will. In Hollywood sometimes she was called "snooty," because instead of joking on the set she would disappear between scenes into her dressing room to work on her lines. She never has been noted for being a "good fellow" on the set, although many a prop man or electrician will consider it fighting words if you say she is "stuck up." Her friend and hairdresser, Josi Elliot, says she is the nicest person she has ever worked with—and notice that Josi didn't say "film star," she said person.

There has never been a breath of scandal about Susan, in a town where scandal is rampant on the lips of gossips. She has always lived quietly, within her means, and conducted herself in a typical hardworking white collar girl fashion.

Until last fall she lived with her mother, in a tiny house in Hollywood. When her sister came from the East with her baby, Susan moved out of the small house to make room for them. She took a small apartment at the Town House (quite (Continued on page 91)

She was once named "the nicest bonfire of 1939." Here you see Susan in a scene from her last picture, "The Hairy Ape"

It's like this now—see? During the last year, Jess has dated 'most every girl in town. Yet his heart was always Susan's and their trip to the altar was truly inevitable.

"For better or for worse" . . . and they meant every word of it! The first Canteen meeting to become marriage since Hedy Lamarr met hubby John Loder.

Picture of two people very much in love and hoping to stay that way. Many times proposed to, it took a sentence from a book to make Susan give Jess the right answer. Gee, ain't it romantic?

Comes the new era in leading men, and comes this man Peck—brilliant new star from the Broadway stage

What-a-find Gregory Peck! Dark haired, blue eyed, 6 feet 2½ inches tall, weighing 170 pounds and 28 years old, he's signed to four contracts Proud father announcements are now in order, too. As of July 20, the Pecks are parents of a fine baby boy, weight 6 lbs., named Jonathan.

The REAL Gregory Peck

By DOROTHY DEERE

Father and son (both named Gregory Peck) at Catalina Island, when Junior was eight. He was always crazy about boats.

At nine, Gregory landed in St. John's Military School, in Los Angeles. A spinal injury keeps him out of the war today, if you're wondering.

Pre-medical student and crew member at the University of California, he went to Poughkeepsie for the regatta in '38.

With his pretty wife, Greta (she was Katharine Cornell's hairdresser when he met her) and his gay young mother, Mrs. Bernice Peck.

GREGORY PECK belongs to the Real Fellow era in leading men. Hollywood has trends in personalities as well as in pictures, as you realize in recalling a few.

You'll remember the Latin Lover trend led by Valentino and Navarro, when leading men had dark cheeks and inflammable eyes; and the Pretty Boy era which had Taylor and Power scampering through life and love without ever getting their hair mussed. The Tuff Guy reign, beginning with Cagney and Gable and working up to Bogart and Ladd, had the heroes making love like "What am I, man or menace?" And then there were International Complications—Boyer, Flynn and Grant; and the Blithe Bobbies, such as Montgomery, Young and Cummings.

Today the picture trend is for realism, whether it be comedy or drama, and the urge is to have very believable young men doing believable things. Look them over—Robert Walker, Van Johnson, John Hodiak, Robert Ryan, Sonny Tufts—not too typed, not too handsome. The kind of fellows you might actually expect to meet outside a collar ad, actually climbing into a lifeboat or flying a plane over Tokyo, or doing any of the things real fellows are doing all over the world today.

Of them all, Peck can be voted The Boy Most Likely to Start a Trend Of His Own.

In appearance and personality, he has a touch of early Gary Cooper, a dash of pre-war Jimmy Stewart, and a slight hangover of Abraham Lincoln. And it would seem that he also has "a certain something" for which none of these three other fellows were especially noted. Put them all together and you have what publicist Jerry Breckenbridge describes as "a keen swordblade of a man"—and we're willing to acknowledge the phrase as more truth than publicity.

Originally signed by Producer Casey Robinson, he is the first actor to begin his Hollywood career with a four-studio contract. During the next four years he will make twelve pictures, and his "home" lot will be practically anyplace he hangs his makeup mirror—at RKO, Twentieth Century, with Casey Robinson or David O. Selznick. Too, he is the only actor to work up to such prestige by virtue of a career of distinguished flops on Broadway. Although Seven-year-old Gregory leans on the family chariot (model 1924) and gives out with a self-conscious grin. (No wonder; pipe the pants!) Peck tells us that, as a kid, he was painfully shy, often lonesome.

As the Hollywood newcomer (his first picture, "Days of Glory," had yet to be released), Peck turned up at the Selznick party, armed with charm and waiting on the femmes. In this case, Kim Hunter.

Gregory himself managed to be adjudged a sensation in each one of them, his plays had a habit of opening and closing so fast the critics hardly had time to walk out on the last acts.

In spite of his choice for Father Chisholm (a role so highly regarded it has been considered equivalent to a burst of applause even to be rumored for it) Peck is rather amazed at the speed with which he has become the big buzz around Hollywood. For awhile, with two pictures completed (RKO's "Days of Glory" was his first) he was being dubbed The Phantom Actor—because he had yet to be seen by the public

"It was an odd feeling," he says, "especially when I found my kid brother David wearing two very black eyes, both of them won at school in defending his statement that his big brother was a 'movie star.' "

The rapidity with which Sex has reared its highly-salable head in his screen career is also a bit disconcerting. Peck has never thought of himself as anything but a character actor—a lead, maybe, but never a "big lover." The truth is, he is happily and devotedly married to one blonde and petite Greta, Finnish by birth, and "the gayest person imaginable."

Recently a quite attractive young lady columnist followed up her introduction to Peck by an invitation to a party.

"My wife will love it, I'm sure," said Gregory innocently

"But I asked you," said the columnist frankly. "I don't need wives for my party—I need men!"

"I assure you I wouldn't be any fun without her," said Mr. Peck, which seemed to wind the matter up successfully.

Intense as only a twenty-eight-year-old chap can be, he has a quick and generous smile. But conversation is a serious matter. Getting him to talk about himself—as anything but an actor—is like diving for pearls. By working just a little bit harder than usual at the question and answer game, however, you gradually get the picture of a person who is very worth knowing.

The most beautiful sound in the world to him is the beat of the ocean. "I was born where I could hear it, you know—in La Jolla, California. It made me dream dreams when I was a kid—and it still does. To me, the motion and sound of the surf has always been a challenge."

The most beautiful sight he ever saw was New York, the first time he looked down on it from the top of the RCA building

"It was early Winter," he remembers, "and early evening. The offices in buildings had lights in them. I watched them blink out, one by one, like eyes closing. I stood up there all by myself for an hour and a half, filled with mixed emotions. It was such a big city, so full of life and drama. To be one of seven million was a humbling thought, but a comforting one; there were others as small as me. It was also an exciting thought—because I knew that to be one who stood out from the seven million would be a fight, and it was the kind of fight I liked."

The smell of train-smoke may not be an inspiring odor to some, but it is to Gregory. "It's a smell with both nostalgia and promise to it—memories of the places I've been, even of those I've only been to in my imagination, and a promise that some day I'll really get to all those places."

As the aged Father Chisholm in "Keys of the Kingdom." Cost to play opposite was Geraldine Fitzgerald! With Peck, her scenes weren't "religious"—so Rosa Stradner took the role.

From his youth, his favorite books have been adventure books. He was close pals with King Arthur and Robin Hood, as a boy. His favorite music is both classical and jazz. "I like big, swelling, inspiring symphonies. Or if it's jazz, I like it really 'dirty,' the kind you hear in the little dives in Harlem where jazz is really born. I don't care much for music that doesn't go any place."

A fellow who likes powerful, restless sights and sounds, pungent odors, music with motion to it—who senses deep and moving things in what ordinary people might pass over with no sensation at all. The man talking is, after all, not unlike the actor who brings strength and sensitivity and tenderness to the screen. For an off-screen glimpse of that quieter emotion, you get it when he talks about his wife.

"I met Greta when we were both on tour with Guthrie McClintic; she was Katharine Cornell's hair dresser. I noticed her at once because she was so pretty, but what really attracted me was that she smiled so much. And what I liked most was that every time she smiled she meant it—it wasn't one of those 'prop' facial gestures. I've found out since it's a smile that doesn't come off very easily—even when she's feeling badly you have to be pretty close to her to guess it.

"Our first date? Well, I asked for it pretty quick, I remember. We went to the Copley-Plaza bar, and while we were sitting there I read her palm—it was the quickest way to hold her hand, I guess. She didn't know I'd never read a palm before—but I felt capable of anything, out on my first date with the first girl I'd ever really fallen for. I guessed a lot of things right, too—about her family, and the way she felt about her brother."

"I proposed in New York, and was finally accepted in San Francisco, and we had dates all the way in between. It's always been wonderful being married to Greta. It was fun even when we were poor—we found hard luck exciting. We had so many friends in the same spot it was a (Continued on page 82)

The bride who cried at her own wedding! Rita's happy enough now, though. She and Orson say they hope their baby will be a little girl. And such enthusiastic parents-in-waiting you've never seen!

"Off the Record"...

Many of the best stories are never told—and that's a fact. Much that is forbidden news finally gets into print—and that's what you have here

By DEE OFSTIE

Tallulah Bankhead at the Stork with Capt. Burgess Meredith. It was before his marriage to Paulette, otherwise a picture like this would be news—likely enough, kept "off the record."

"DON'T print that—" "This one's off the record—" "Not for publication—please!"

Someday some follower of Freud is going to get around to investigating what makes a reporter wake up screaming, and he'll find the answer in one of the three phrases above. One of the sad truths a movie-newsgatherer learns in her profession is that the best stories she'll ever get are the ones she won't be able to print—not right away, anyhow.

Just what makes an actor (or actress) suffer an unfair story in silence, then grow skittish over a true tale you'd think he'd be glad to have his public know, is not always understandable. Often, however, the reasons are human enough to make the reporter want to be human, too. Then, there's that second great truth that can be classified as the newsgatherer's reward: The fact that times change, people grow into or out of their careers, and sometimes those "off the record" yarns grow all the mellower for the holding.

We've seen few movie males cry—large, limpid, but very ashamed tears—and each time, out of respect for the genuineness of the emotion, we've forborne exposing it in print.

But there comes a time—and it's time now, for example, to tell how we sat through a session in Boys' Court with Jackie Cooper. Jackie, then at the ripe old age of fifteen, was about to embark on a picture called "Boy of the Streets," and the courtroom visit was in the interests of atmosphere. It was a good day for it, with a steady stream of incorrigibles coming to the bar.

Sulky, snarling little animals they were, hurling their piteous stories defiantly in the face of their adult captors. Then, gradually, a strange fact became apparent. Although their dirt, their poverty nor their crimes could shame them, the (Continued on page 75)

It's Jackie Cooper (at right). He's in the Navy now. At fifteen, reporters were fair enough to look the other way and not see something he didn't want seen.

Bogie and Maya—the good-fellow Bogarts, according to the story told about their "services rendered" on a premiere trip.

James Cagney, photographed as he arrived in London when he went to tour the various American Commands entertaining the U. S. Forces. What few of his service audiences know is that for many years he refused to perform in public—because he was too shy.

A Marine and his missus. Formerly the Robert Ryans of Hollywood, but come Bob's induction and they were just like any other couple—saying brave goodbyes.

Turning in his travel orders at the San Diego Recruiting Barracks, Ryan is officially "in."

First step in the Marine training program, being outfitted with clothes. The weights and standing on a special machine help determine his shoe size.

The 34-year-old motion picture star assumes make-up that is strictly regulation. A GI haircut is just one of the many phases experienced as he's transformed into Private Ryan, candidate for boot training.

How a rugged movie Marine stacks up as a recruited regular. Actor into private, Screen stuff to the real thing—and doing O.K.

MARINE RYAN

By His Wife, Jessica

THE day was dismal and gray. The dreary building in downtown Los Angeles was dismal and gray. The streets were gray, too, and quite deserted, for it was that ungodly hour of the morning, at which time all good men seem to have to go to the aid of their country.

"So long," said he. "So long," said I. Then I drove off up the street, bawling to my heart's content.

Bob went into the Recruiting Office of the United States Marine Corps.

"So, you're Ryan," said the Sergeant.

"Yes," answered Ryan, with a slight tremolo in his voice. He suddenly discovered his knees were knocking together in what seemed like a fine drum roll. He suddenly realized that he'd never had such a bad case of stage fright in all his life.

The Sergeant looked at him oddly. "They recognized me," Ryan thought smugly to himself, and felt bucked up, momentarily. But it was a funny look. Something was fishy.

"Sit down over there," the sergeant said. So Bob joined the other recruits on the row of benches. Then he realized the guys around him were giving him that same fishy stare. He turned to the fellow next to him and smiled tentatively. The man looked back at him, seemed to be taking his courage in his hands, and said:

"Say, what's that get-up you've got on?"

Bob looked down at his clothes. So, all right! The pants didn't match the coat. So, okay! The work socks and shoes (on which the soles were practically flapping off) didn't go with the navy blue pin stripe trousers. So what? Someone told him you junked your clothes at the end of the line. And anyway, who said you had to be elegant entering the Marines?

"Aren't you an actor?" his new found friend inquired doubtfully.

"Sure," said Bob.

"Well, you sure don't look like one!" the guy exploded.

Bob laughed. "Most actors don't," he answered. "You should see Bing Crosby!"

But this didn't completely reassure his friend.

"Well . . ." he started off, tentative again. "Where's your stuff? I mean, didn't you bring anything with you?"

"Nope," Bob replied, this time really smug and pleased with himself. To think he'd gotten away from the female clutches of his mother, his wife, and his mother-in-law, quite free of money belts, stationery, writing portfolios, leather picture frames, sewing kits, toilet kits, cigarette cases, pen and pencil sets, and bill folds, all nicely marked with Marine insignia.

"Yeah, but how do you expect to shave in camp?"

"Oh, they give you all that stuff," Bob replied.

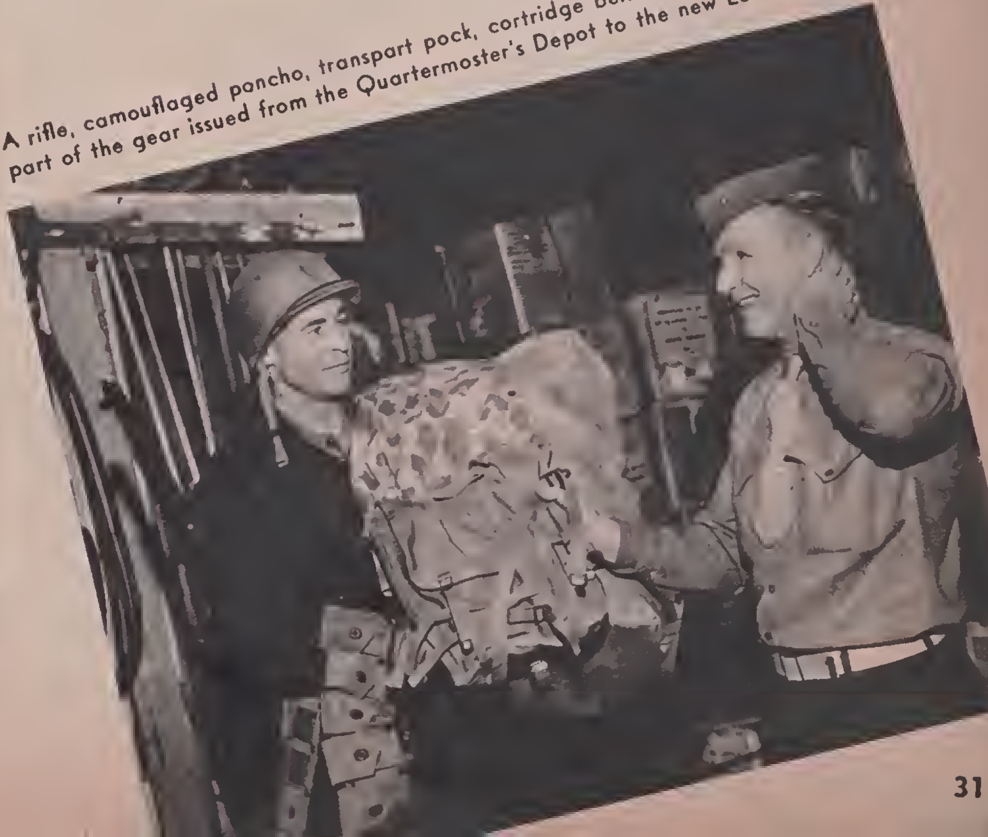
A rifle, camouflaged poncho, transport pack, cartridge belt and mess kit are all part of the gear issued from the Quartermaster's Depot to the new Leatherneck.



MARINE RYAN (CONTINUED)

Bob had a foretaste of the real thing—only for his starring role in the "Raiders," he wore Captain's bars and hobnobbed with officers.

Bob with Pat O'Brien (their commissions donated by RKO). Buddies in the Marine pic, Pat came to Bob's rescue at camp.

The guy shook his head slowly from one side to the other. "Oh, no they don't," he said.

"Say," the guy on Bob's left joined in, "didn't they send you a list of directions?"

"What list of directions?"

"The list that tells you what to bring!"

"No . . ." A terrified look was beginning to appear on Bob's face. He'd never received any list. A whole drama was suddenly being enacted in his mind's eye. An unshaven face, an angry Drill Instructor, an irate Sergeant, a stern M.P., a cold and lonely brig.

"Hey!" He made a dive for the pleasant looking P.F.C., standing near.

"Back to your seat, Ryan!" came the Sergeant's emphatic voice, "and address your superiors as 'sir'."

"Yes, sir," came the small, weak answer.

But the P.F.C. was still his savior. "I'll get you some stuff," he said. "Give me some dough."

Bob rummaged in the pocket of his frayed suit and came up with a dollar bill.

"This is all I have," he said. "I didn't think we'd need any money, either."

So when the Los Angeles recruits piled off the bus in San Diego, the boys were carrying a variety of bags and suitcases—but Ryan stepped off clutching a crumpled paper sack.

The Marine Base was a familiar sight. Only a few months earlier he had been there with the "Marine Raiders" company, doing location scenes for the picture. But what a difference! Then he'd worn a Captain's bars and had hobnobbed with officers. He and Pat O'Brien were figures of glamour as they moved around the Base for various scenes.

"You ain't glamorous to me," was the look in that Sergeant's face, the one with hash marks half way up his sleeve.

An encouraging Marine had told him when he was here before: "You may run into trouble at first, Bob. People are sort of suspicious of actors." Bob wasn't nervous. He's a big guy and can take care of himself. But he didn't want any trouble.

So the days passed in a confused and hectic daze, yet there wasn't any trouble. One day Bob confessed to a bunk mate about the warning.

"Listen," said the fellow Boot, "most of these guys saw you bat that Jap around in that movie, 'Behind the Rising Sun,' and they're afraid you might be as rugged as you look."

Bob smiled to himself, because that was the ultimate compliment one Marine can give to another. So he was content. He felt he was "in."

They were too busy to get homesick, at least that's what Bob thought. The other "old men" of the platoon seemed to agree. (The "old men" were called "Pop" or "Grand Dad" by the other Boots, and ranged in age from twenty-nine to thirty-four.)

But the kids were different, Bob found out. There was one kid. He was just eighteen.

"I ran away from home when I was fifteen, to join a circus," he told Bob. "I tended elephants." From then on he was Elephant Boy—or if they wanted to be fancy, Sabu.

"Say, my elephants are wonderful! I have three of them to take care of. They love me. They're my friends," the boy would say, and look wistful and sad.

One night Bob was lying on his bunk. The rest of the guys were asleep, he thought. Then he heard a noise. It sounded like someone crying. He crawled out and listened. It was "Sabu," crying his heart out and trying desperately to stifle the sound in the blanket.

"What's the trouble, kid?" Bob asked. The boy didn't answer. "Come on. Spit it out. It'll do you good." And all the time he was thinking: Lord, he's just a kid. He looks about ten years old. "You're homesick, I'll bet," he said, jabbing his fist at the boy's arm.

Do CASANOVAS Make the Best Husbands?

Disguised as a doctor, Casanova Brown (Gary Cooper) invades a maternity ward, kidnaps his own daughter.

Teresa Wright comes back to the screen as Isabel Drury in International's "Casanova Brown" picture.

CASANOVA, the historians tell us, was an Italian author who wrote his memoirs, probably little dreaming that he'd become such a legendary figure and his name applied, hundreds of years later, with such romantic meaning.

Being a Casanova today, as you know, is synonymous with being "a ladies' man."

Scenario writer Nunnally Johnson has created a character called "Casanova Brown." Gary Cooper plays the title role, in the International picture soon to be released by RKO-Radio.

There was a time when Hollywood felt Cooper could play only serious "he-man" roles. But here he is, a screen father for the first time, and the center of this hilarious plot wherein he's a small-town teacher pursued by not just one—but three—beautiful girls, intentions matrimony.

Which brings us to the point of our question. Starting with the premise that men labeled as Casanovas are popular with the fair sex, International Productions and the publishers of Movieland magazine want your opinion: Do Casanovas make the best husbands?

Letters should be addressed to Contest Editor, MOVIELAND MAGAZINE, 1476 Broadway, N. Y. C., and should not exceed 100 words.

And now here's a surprise! In addition to the contest editors, the judges will be Teresa Wright and Gary Cooper, in person.

First prize for the best letter is a $500 war bond. Second prize is a beautiful I. J. Fox persian lamb coat, with the new flange sleeves and voluminous turn-back cuffs, and many other prizes. (See list above.)

THE LUCKY LADD

BY ALAN LADD

(As told to Marion Cooper)

THE worst thing about turning points in your life is that you rarely recognize them as such, until after they've happened. Or maybe that's the best thing about them—at least for a worrying kind of guy like me.

I get into a stew about every decision I have to make. If I could have known in advance that certain decisions were to change the very course of my life, I'm sure my hair would be snow white by now.

I guess the logical place to start is with the first big change in my life, when I was seven. We were living in Denver, when my mother and stepfather decided to move to California. Not just like that, though. There had been months of debate, with Mother against the idea. I sided with Father, because to me the proposed trip across country in our ancient Ford represented Adventure.

I'd already had a taste of adventure, with quite disastrous results, the year before.

It happened on the Fourth of July, when Mother made the mistake of going downtown with a neighbor, and leaving me to my own devices. The neighbor's little boy had no reputation for great goodness, so his mother had prudently tied him to a tree (Continued on page 79)

On the set of his latest picture, "Two Years Before the Mast." While in the Army Air Corps, sixty newspapers voted Laddie to be "the most popular actor," awarded him this trophy (at right).

By AVERY CARROLL

A CHANCE FOR ROMANCE

Too young to be old, Deanna claims the right now to be gay and carefree. She wants dancing and romancing, dates that aren't serious. It's catching up on things she has missed.

Deanna takes time out for her teens. It's as simple as that . . . she wants to recapture the youth she never had "Goadnight, Dickie bay" . . . it was a message intended for her three-year-old nephew. But the columnists picked it up and made their own guesses.

Celebrating her twenty-second birthday, Deonna gave a party an the "Christmas Holiday" set.

The rule is that Canteen warkers can't make dotes with service men. All the same, when Durbin is there (which is usually on Tuesday nights) she gets mony invitations.

Deanno has many things in camman with Anne Shirley, who's her best friend. They agree an oll subjects, enjoy shared canfidences, have the same interests.

WHEN Miss Deanna Durbin actually falls in love again, and decides to marry the lucky man, the announcement will come formally from her parents. It will be attended by the same dignity and restraint as characterized her first engagement and marriage.

Meanwhile, you may discount all the questioning little lines printed about her being enamoured of this or that highly interesting citizen.

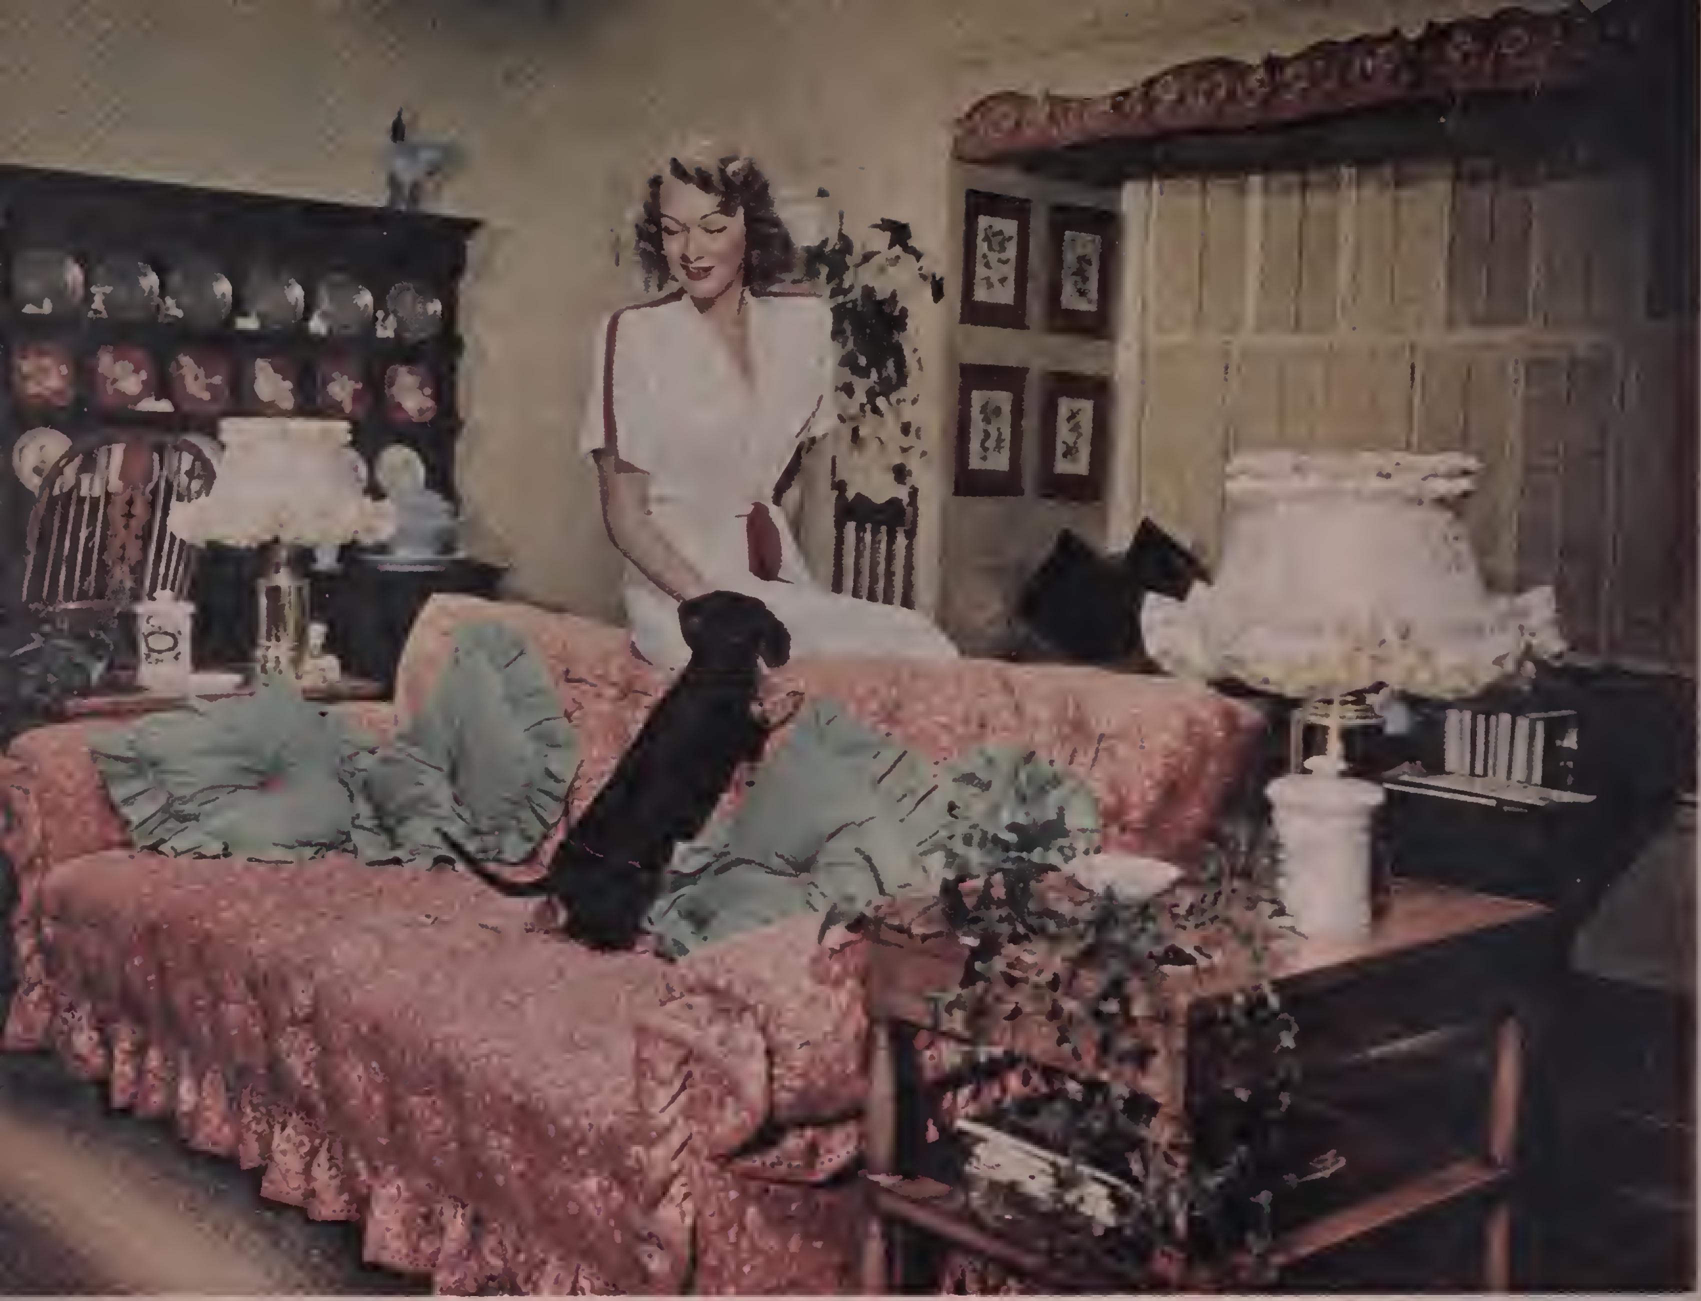
That many eligible gentlemen are interested in beautiful Deanna is only natural. But as for marriage, the facts are these: Deanna's interlocutory decree was handed down on December 14, 1943, so matrimony until December 15, 1944—at the earliest—is an impossibility for her.

As to re-marriage in California there are two laws: first, one must be legally free; second, one must have a party of the second part.

Those who know Deanna well, hence respect her fineness and general integrity, will be glad to take your sizable bet that she won't marry for at least another two years. She has some very important girlhood years to replace. After all, she grew up as a business woman.

At an age when other girls were worrying about what to wear to the high school sophomore prom, Deanna was working half a day before the (Continued on page 86)

With Fred de Cardova, at the Mocambo. No matter where she goes, it storts rumors; her every escart is eyed os being a candidate for marrioge. Yes, Deanno—it's the price af being a celebrity!

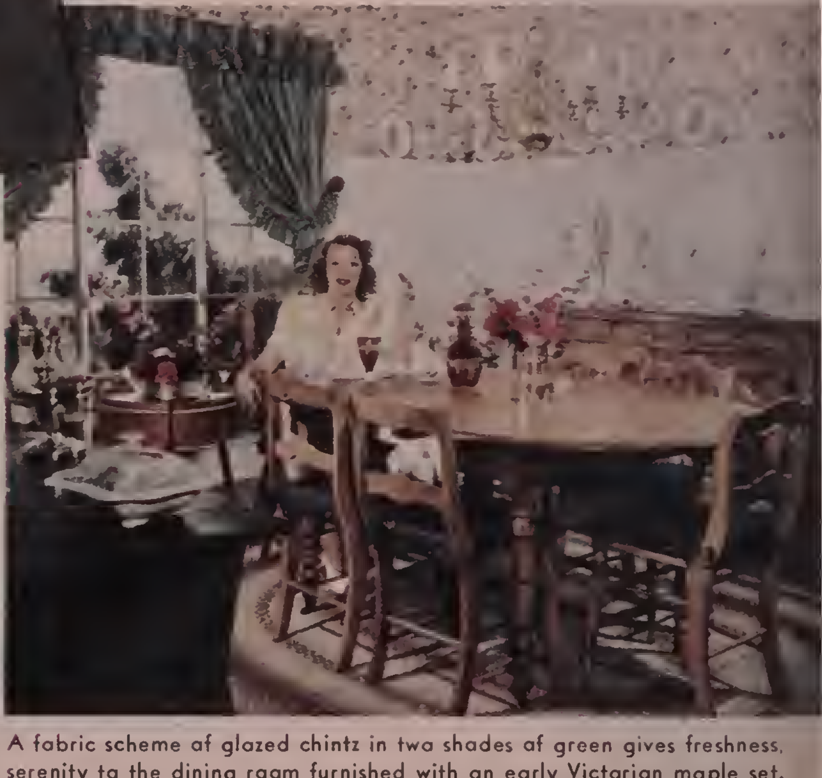


While Miss Arden's living room can hardly be called quaint, the simple cotton print couch covering was a logical selection. Gay and bright, still it's consistent with the end tables (which are copies of French plant tables); with the French oil lamps and Yorkshire Windsor chair.

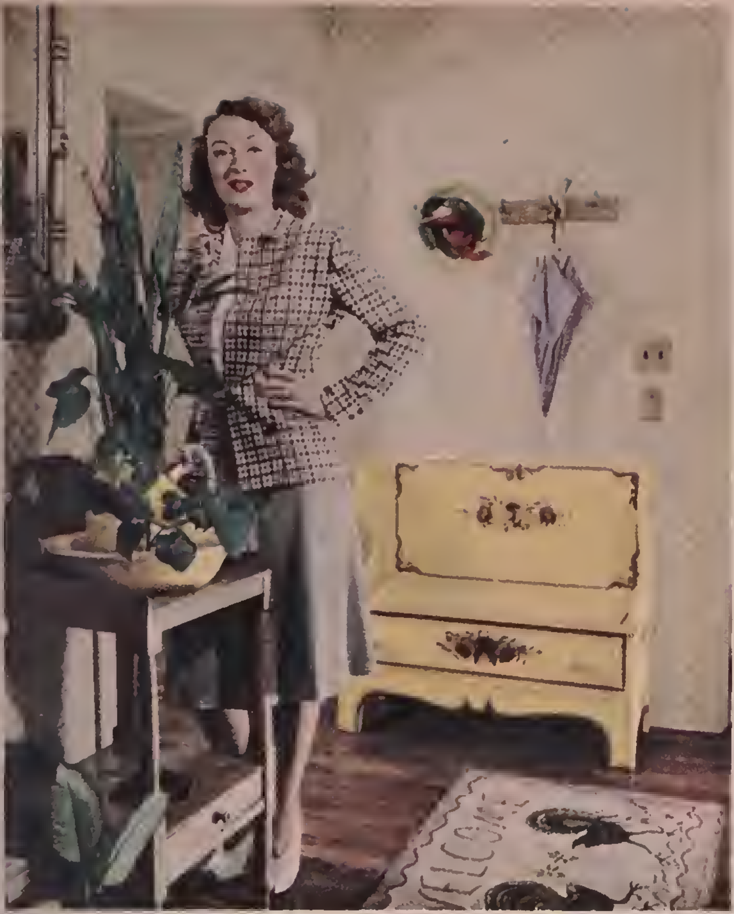
PERFECTLY PERIOD

HOLLYWOOD has turned a new trick—with "period homes" that are modern. And probably with no better result, for being completely pleasing and at the same time in tune with the demands for modern living, than has been accomplished by Eve Arden, Warner Bros. star whom you'll see next in "The Doughgirls."

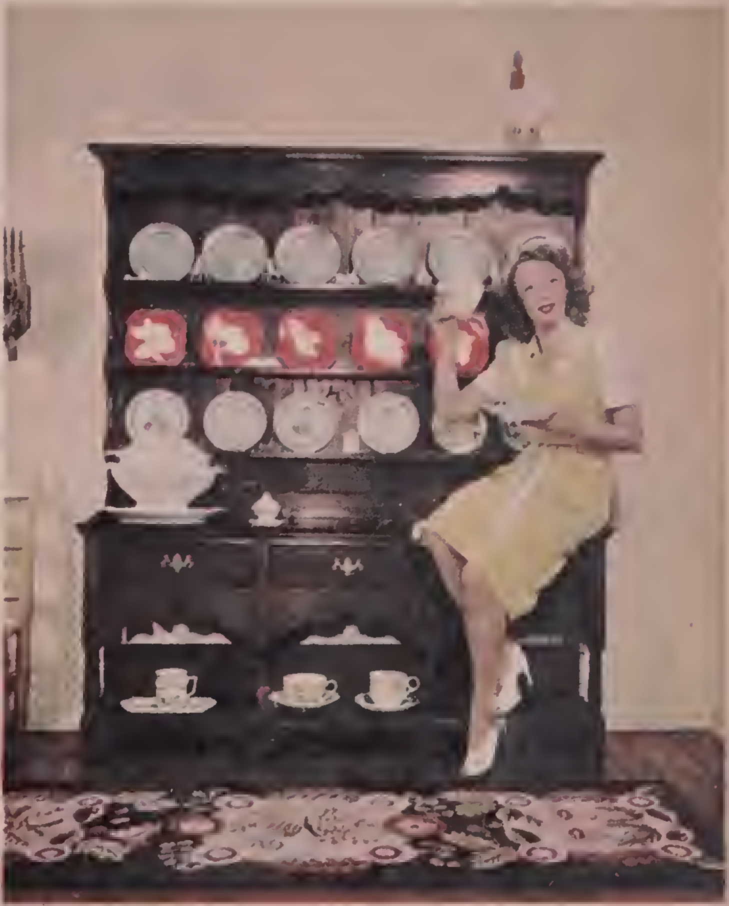
Miss Arden did the entire decorating and furnishing job for her Hollywood "house on a hill" in less than three months, so that her husband (Ned Bergen) might see it complete before he went into the Army. But rushed as she was, working so against time (and she did much of the painting and drape-making herself), you'll note that it's thoroughly consistent. Which is the important "do," if you're striving for an inspired effect from using old furniture pieces in a modern setting.



A fabric scheme of glazed chintz in two shades of green gives freshness, serenity to the dining room furnished with an early Victorian maple set. Drum table by the window is a Revolutionary War drum; Spode china on the sideboard of Mayflower pattern; the glassware is Bohemian.



It's no chance accident that this old straw hat should be hanging in the entrance hall. The parasol, too—they're part of the decor. The yellow seat is a restored Hitchcock bench; maple table is an old converted washstand. The sampler on the floor is new.



Close-up view of the Welsh cupboard in the living room, showing how Miss Arden displays her fine old pewter plates and collection of Jean Mannley pottery (top row); red and white plates (center) are new; the white plates with green (bottom row) are old French.

Eve Arden's home is Country Victorian all tied together in cheerful uniformity. Her antics with antiques are original but cozily practical Ingenious conversions are a specialty in this house, which is what makes it so charming. A child's sleigh serves both as a table and magazine rack; copper mortar and pestle on the bookshelf is a place to deposit mail. And note the hurricane lamps above the fireplace.

A victorian bedroom, with mahogany bed made from a Victorian sofa; round night tables (Victorian commodes); an old music box, which really works. Italian pinewood cupids at either side of the green glazed chintz swag are a century old.

Remember Dane in "Destination Tokyo"? (The scene here is with William Prince, Bob Hutton and John Garfield.) Soon you'll be seeing him in "The Very Thought of You," which is his next.

WE NOMINATE

Dane Clark

BECAUSE he's a man who's been through much, who now knows what he wants, and what he wants is acting. . . . BECAUSE he walked quite serenely into "Destination Tokyo" and "Action In The North Atlantic" and took scenes away from the likes of Cary Grant, John Garfield, and Humphrey Bogart. He will be seen shortly in "The Very Thought of You" and "Hollywood Canteen" . . . BECAUSE after a very successful career on Broadway, he came to California to see what pictures were like, and whether he enjoyed them before he was taken into the army. Born in New York City about 30 years ago, Dane worked his way through high school, Cornell University, and St. John's Law School. Among his many methods of acquiring tuition money were playing professional baseball and football and boxing in amateur circles. The watches he won in four or ten rounds of scrapping were invariably hocked as soon as the competition was over. . . . BECAUSE, after passing his New York Bar examination, he discovered that the one legal opening he had been aiming for through school had been given to a relative of the boss. His introduction to acting came when he was dared to try for a part on Broadway, and he not only got the part but found that the stage paid more dough than he had made up to then. He subsequently was George in "Of Mice and Men," Babyface Martin in "Dead End," and appeared in "Stage Door," "Golden Boy," and "Panic," among other plays. . . . BECAUSE, four years after he had lightheartedly slapped on greasepaint for the first time, he fell in love with his profession with a passion and humbleness which we have seldom seen equalled. . . . BECAUSE he has a definitely mad sense of humor, is 5'10", has brown eyes and a shock of brown hair, and claims "a Joe Doakes appearance." . . . BECAUSE we think his sincerity will reach motion picture audiences. . . . We believe that these things will eventually bring him to stardom.

FOR STARDOM

Jeanne Crain

BECAUSE in "Home in Indiana" her performance portraying a young girl has seldom been equalled for sweetness and naturalness. And she is actually in real life pretty much that same girl. . . . BECAUSE her studio, 20th Century-Fox, feels she has such capabilities that they've put her into "In the Meantime, Darling," "Winged Victory," and are now in the process of buying five years' worth of stories for her. . . . BECAUSE she is that legendary quantity, a native Californian, and was brought up in Westwood, a mere ten minutes from Fox. She had a happy, commonplace childhood, went to St. Mary's Academy and UCLA, and took care of a sister two years younger than she. She was in high school plays and never intended to go into pictures. . . . BECAUSE she was seen in the audience of a Max Reinhardt production by studio talent scouts who had come to see the actors on the stage, and was so attractive that they promptly forgot everything but getting her telephone number and her signature on a contract. Off-screen, she does portraits in oils and pastels and takes Spanish lessons "in case I ever go to Mexico." . . . BECAUSE she is 5′4″, has wide-set hazel eyes that look dreamy, and abundant reddish-brown hair. She neither smokes nor drinks. Her ambition is to "play people with character," and she'd have died with happiness if they had let her do Francie in "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn." . . . BECAUSE her favorite thespians are such able men and women as Gregory Peck, Ingrid Bergman and Vivian Leigh, and she hopes one day to do half as well as they. . . . BECAUSE she is well-bred without being dull, a young girl without being a child, and has a freshness about her which has not been seen since her idol, Miss Bergman, first stepped across a set in "Intermezzo." . . . We think that, with these attributes, she should go far.

Many girls want to get into pictures, and don't; Jeanne had no intention of it, and did. Such things do happen. She was one of Lon McAllister's competing girl friends in "Home in Indiana."

Gene Kelly

KEEPING UP WITH the Kellys

By MARCIA DAUGHTREY

You can call it the luck o' the Irish.
Happy at home, his career going great guns—everything Gene dreamed of wanting, he has!

SHE descended the stairway leading to Billy Rose's Diamond Horseshoe, with a pert swish of brief velvet skating skirt. She was very proud of her outfit, which consisted of the underpinning just mentioned, topped by a snug, padded black velvet jacket. On her dark auburn hair she wore a mere gesture of a hat consisting of a bunch of deep purple violets. She was just sixteen.

She saw a pleasant-faced man with smooth black hair and an air of good-humored relaxation. His white shirt was unbuttoned at the throat, and his sleeves were rolled up.

"Is Mr. Rose here?" the visitor asked with great authority.

The gentleman in shirt-sleeves shook his head. "Sorry. Is there anything I can do for you?"

There is nothing so cool as the peremptoriness of a lass of sixteen. She indicated an appointment card that she had received through the mail. "Mr. Rose sent me this," she said in the tone of a prosecuting attorney, "asking me to be here at one o'clock. I've given up my lunch hour to come here, so I should think the least he could do . . ."

"Why don't you come back tomorrow?" asked the Following the war is a major interest of Gene's. "Christmas Holiday" is his current picture (Universal produced) his next is MGM's "Ziegfeld Follies."

Bicycle built for one . . . but it accommodates two when Gene takes the day off for a spin.

Life on the Kelly plan: guests every Saturday night; a friendly game of croquet when Gene's schedule at the studio will permit. All fun, and without fuss.

Okay, so it's being a ham! But what father isn't? Gene is a real family man; wants four children, boys, too. All the same, he's all for having his wife resume her career on the stage.

calm character, taking the whole thing in his stride

Miss Betsy Blair (born Betsy Boger) said with some asperity that she would try to return the next day. And she went back up the stairs, her skirts bristling with exasperation. She had no way of knowing, of course, that she had just met her future husband, and that, in the summer of 1944, she would be telling him goodbye each morning as he left to work for M-G-M in "Ziegfeld Follies."

What concerned her far more, at the time, was her discovery the next day that she had met—in the person of the open-collared gentleman—Mr. Billy Rose's dance director, one Gene Kelly. She had been plainly snippy to him, and she spent several uneasy moments in the chorus lineup, wondering if he might consider that a lady's annoyance affected her dancing ability.

She breathed her first sigh of relief when she was told to step out of line and execute a few standard dance steps. These, she breezed through. She was then ordered to the sideline chairs to await the second winnowing. At the end of the final series of tests, Miss Blair learned that, for several months, she was going to be taking instruction from the man she had upstaged. Oddly enough the prospect intrigued, rather than dismayed, her.

It is standard procedure for chorus girls to have a crush on the dance director, so Betsy pursued this normal course, disguising it as best she knew how. When, after several weeks rehearsal, she happened to be leaving the building at the same time Gene was and he said casually, "Going out for lunch? Well, then, let's have a sandwich together," she managed to nod impersonally.

After that, they began to spend their noon hours together. However, there were usually other people with them, making up a group. Betsy celebrated her seventeenth birthday at one of these gatherings and, upon being drawn out, admitted that she had been graduated from High School when she was fifteen. "Precocious little wench, weren't you?" someone observed.

"Darned right," grinned Betsy. "I was smart. I skipped grades. I loved school . . . everything, even math. Then, when I wanted to go to Sarah Lawrence College and was interviewed, can you imagine how I felt at being told that, not only was I merely fifteen, hence too young—but that I was a young fifteen. So I got a job in the chorus, where youth is no handicap."

Gene Kelly laughed. He had always liked pretty girls with sparkle, but this one had other attributes as well: intelligence and a sense of humor. When the Diamond Horseshoe closed, he kept in touch with Betsy. He went to work in "Pal Joey" and Betsy got a job in "Panama Hattie." When "Hattie" closed, Betsy went on to Saroyan's "Beautiful People."

After their respective shows, Betsy and Gene met at Louis Bergen's and had steaks highly flavored by the conversations of theatrical people who made the spot their rendezvous. It was there that Betsy came to know Gene's food phobias. His idea (Continued on page 68)

LARAINE DAY

TO BE intensively individual, and yet to need the close cooperation of those with whom she is surrounded, is the biggest problem 1944 is solving for this lovely daughter of the Sign Libra.

Through bitter disappointment, the last four years have been teaching her to be discriminating without losing trust, to be equal to the big plans of those who hold her interests at heart, and to develop a personality of her own which will, before the next year is half over, find her suddenly at the top, through the fulfillment of the most demanding role of her career.

This is partially because she has helped others, as well as taken the opportunities presented her with firm decision and rare good judgment.

Partnership matters have been upsetting because her own keen mentality has given her the knowledge that she was usually right in her attitude and actions; but a natural unrest occurred because others entered into a partnership relation which was not always either pleasant or profitable.

This was especially prominent during the first of 1944, but should have been well adjusted by now. June brought a better understanding around the 20th, and any separate angle was then cleared up and, in the light of her career, which means so much to her, adjusted on a more permanent basis.

With Uranus in her first House at birth, she will always do the unexpected—usually with good results, since Uranus is ruler of that House, and her basic character is one of honesty and a real desire to help others on their way. Few stars have the opportunities 1944 brings the beautiful Laraine, especially after June, in the realization of their dreams and ambitions.

Jupiter conjunct Neptune in the sign Leo has brought her a steady ambition regarding her profession, the fulfillment of which has meant far more to her than the financial advantages involved. This may seem strange, but it is the fire back of all true genius. Laraine is a genius, for she has sublimated much at a great cost, to gain the chance to prove herself worthy of the place she holds today—and of the high place she will occupy in some near tomorrow.

Libra . . . for those persons born between September 24 and October 23

THIS amazing year has wrought such big changes, with such rapidity, that doubtless most Libra natives are still pinching themselves, wondering if it is just blind luck, or a more lasting quality which has made for their success.

Courage, especially commendable on your part, has brought you your rewards. Naturally timid by nature, desirous of harmony and happy cooperation, it is difficult for you to make your own judgments and demand what you know you are worthy of having, and at the same time please everybody concerned as well as yourself.

If you have not allowed others to coerce you into promises beyond your ability to fulfill, if you have accepted new freedoms and kept your head during any sudden rise to prominence, you are nicely set for a long time on that fulfillment of your personal goal.

New friends add to your appreciation of the nicer things, and old friends will still add zest to living if you forgive whatever seemed so bewilderingly unfair in the conduct of someone dear to you during the first of the year.

However, do not be too trusting in matters concerning signing of papers, especially concerning property deals. Remember, you have your own future to consider, and plan it to be as peaceful as it promises—not trusting entirely to others to do so for you.

Don't allow your mental worries to affect your health, and you are sure of having a continuous prosperity during the year to come.

Your Problem and Mine

BY Bonita Granville

When the problems get too tough, Bonita's mother is always standing by to aid with the advice rendering.

It's no fun to have a problem you can't solve, especially when you're in the early 'teens. Then it seems as if all the advice you get from grown-ups is pretty dull and mostly wrong. But here's someone who wants to help you: Write to Bonita Granville, Movieland Magazine, 9126 Sunset Boulevard, Los Angeles 46, California

Dear Miss Granville:

I am almost sixteen years old, and I would like you to help me with my problem.

You see I am in love with a boy who lives in Boston, and I know he likes me very much. But twice he has broken a date with me, and then later on those same evenings friends of mine have told me that they have seen him with another girl.

He is going into the Army this summer, and he says we can be engaged then.

Should I just forget about those broken dates and go ahead with the engagement?

Thanks for your help. I'll be looking for your answer.

Sincerely,
Catherine P.

Dear Catherine:

First of all, I definitely believe you are too young to be engaged. And secondly, those broken dates you speak of should act as a warning to you to refrain from getting too serious with the boy.

Instead, why not try to ease your relationship with him into one of friendship, and play 'hard to get' with him. That always works out because if he is seriously interested in you he will value your dates that much more, try harder to get them, and then keep them.

Remember that a boy never respects a girl who runs after him—so give the new method a try.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Bonita:

I am so miserable at home that I must write to you and ask your advice on my problem.

Although I am seventeen, I just don't get along with anyone at home. Everyone argues with me, and my sisters and brothers make fun of me and nag me all the time, and then my parents take their side of the argument all the time.

This makes me so mad and unhappy that I don't know whether to quit school and go away or just what to do.

Yours truly,
Lucy S.

Dear Lucy:

The best and only way to get along in this world is to start by getting along at home. After all, if you can't get along with the members of your family, don't you think there may be some blame attached to you?

I suggest that you try to see the other person's point of view the next time you are involved in arguments at home, and you will be surprised to find that you may have unconsciously always placed yourself on the "right" side and everyone else on the other side of the fence.

This is excellent training for the future, because in business you must get along with people even if you KNOW you are right, while here at home you have a fair chance in an argument.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Miss Granville:

My boyfriend is in camp in the South, and I write to him every day.

He writes wonderful letters to me, saying he still loves me and all that, but the problem I have is that he also writes the same kind of letters to my sister.

Also, he always mentions her in the letters he writes to me, and it makes me furious.

Do you think that it is right for him to write love letters to my sister when he is engaged to me?

Sincerely
Anne.

Dear Anne:

Evidently the boy is not in love with either of you if he continues to write love letters to both of you simultaneously.

Why not try answering his letters with a lighter, more general style the next few times, making them less personal and newsier and chattier, the way you would write to an old friend—and then see if he answers in the same style.

If so, then you can be sure he is glad of the opportunity to slip out of a serious relationship with you, and you will be spared the unhappiness of having this happen during your next meeting with him.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Bonita:

I have fallen in love with a soldier, and although I am only sixteen, I love him

Girl from Portland makes good! Jane Powell, 15-year-old new singing discovery. (Below, pictures of her hometown visit.)

By KATHERINE LAKE

NOT DICK, NOT WILLIAM . . . JANE

THE SINGING, DANCING POWELL!

THEY are still telling the story around NBC. It happened last spring, during one of the late April Bergen-McCarthy-Snerd broadcasts. One of those Olympian women with the chest expansion of a hippo, told her next-seat neighbor in a Gargantuan whisper, "There's Jane Powell, sitting over at one side of the stage. She's going to sing in a minute. They say she's only a little girl, and they dress her that way, but when she stands up and begins to sing, you'll note that her voice is mature. She's no adolescent."

Just in front of this omniscient one was a slim, quiet woman who had obviously reached the end of her patience. "I happen to know Jane Powell and her father and mother," she said hotly. "I happen to know that she's only fifteen!"

The ample one simply glared.

Those of you who have seen "Song Of The Open Road" will understand both sides of the controversy. Jane is obviously a fifteen-year-old girl with starry blue eyes, a dimpled face, and a shock of chestnut hair. She is also owner and operator of an astonishingly mature voice, supple with curves of gold, rich with a distillate of rubies, soft and sweet like custard pie.

Perhaps the most remarkable fact in a short and remarkable life to date is that Jane's career happened to her in much the same manner that a venison dinner happens to the average family: by courtesy of the neighbors.

Jane was born in Portland, Oregon, on April 1, 1929 (a birthday that has always caused her considerable embarrassment among her school mates). Her legal name is Suzanne Burce. Her father, Paul E.

Honored pupil of Beoumont school

Jane tries her old desk, visits ex-teachers.

JANE

Well now, look who's here! It's Jimmy, a young Orang-Utang from the St. Louis zoo.

Her part in "Song of the Open Road" completed, Jane went to New York, then toured army camps.

Jane's first introduction to Hollywood was as guest soloist on the Bergen-McCarthy radio show. Metro soon had her name on a contract.

At the Stage Door Canteen, Jane chats with a pair of admiring sailors—one is British, one American.

Burce, was a salesman for a company manufacturing infants' food; Mrs. Burce had always wanted to be an actress, but had married too happily and too young to give a post-wedding career the slightest consideration.

Naturally, she decided that young Suzanne was to learn dancing. Suzanne showed early ability along those lines and participated in her first dance recital when she was four; she was a terrific success. She seemed to have a natural sense of rhythm and an indigenous understanding of music. In the evening, after she had practiced dance steps until she was weary, she made it a habit to sit on the floor in front of the radio and sing with the vocalists. Before long she knew the lyric of every popular song and could cling to a band accompaniment without flaw

Enter: the neighbors. One evening a family friend happened to pause in the midst of a bridge game to direct a searching glance toward Suzanne. Once having made certain that it was really Suzanne who was uttering those delightful sounds, the neighbors said with energy, "That child has a remarkable voice. It should be trained."

Mother and Father Burce were pleased that their daughter made comfortable music but they didn't take the Galli-Curci suggestions very seriously. A few weeks later a second neighbor, stopping in for a brief chat, caught Suzanne at her radio ritual and told Mrs. Burce that it surely wouldn't do any harm to give the child vocal lessons along with her dancing. "Remarkable voice," said the neighbor, "remarkable!"

So, when Suzanne was eleven, Mrs. Burce took her to a vocal teacher who had been highly recommended. Rather tentatively Mrs. Burce said that "many people seemed to think" that Suzanne had a pleasant voice. Would the teacher listen to her, to see if she had any possibilities? The teacher, plagued no doubt by many shrill and adenoidal young hopefuls, motioned Suzanne mechanically to the piano, explained what was expected of the human larynx, and pounced on a few chords.

Suzanne pounced, too. Her nimble voice leaped its way prankishly from height to height like a monkey in a ladder factory.

After applying to Suzanne the most arduous of tests, the teacher said cautiously that with training and application Suzanne might well develop a remarkable voice. The teacher did not stand and shout "Excelsior," but residents of the district remarked afterward that something strongly resembling (Continued on page 72)

'THE FACE' Speaks

Anita Colby is to modelling what Frank Sinatra is to his racket. His nickname is The Voice—hers is The Face

Fashions are fun to Anita Colby and beauty is her business. She qualifies for advising the stars, having been a model once herself

Glamour which accentuates the importance of good grooming. The new part-in-the-middle coiffure, built high to suit the shape of the face, back hair in a net.

Above, costume completeness with midnight blue suit; blouse and lining, hot pink shantung. Hat and gloves are always "musts." (See contrast, right)

ANITA COLBY broke into the "pretty picture" field in 1935. Then twenty, she was seen, signed, and extolled to advertising agencies by John Powers. Previous to this, she had absorbed a snatch or two of education at St. Agnes Seminary in New York and Miss Madeira's in Washington, D. C. There she majored in French, English and Art, with the emphasis on design and illustration.

With the first quick flash of the Colby pics before the guys who are interested in such things, Powers found he had a winner. Anita began appearing on more magazine covers and in more advertisements than she could have attempted to count. She wound up as the top model in the business.

But that wasn't enough for Colby. Neither was starting many other models in the trade and seeing them make good. Neither was assisting Harry Conover, himself a model, in the formation of his own agency. Neither was a contract with RKO for a year's work on such films as "Mary of Scotland," "The Bride Walks Out," and "Walking On Air."

HI, GOOD people. Though summer is over, music is still here. So if you'll stop admiring your tans for a few minutes and sound your "a's," I'll give you the downbeat, and we'll get on with the business at hand.

HOLLYWOOD STUFF:

Bob Crosby finished "My Baby Loves Music," his last picture for Universal, packed away his baton, said goodbye to his pals and was off to the Marines. He is now Lt. George Robert Crosby, and is stationed at Camp Elliot in San Diego. He may take a Marine band overseas.

Harry James is back in Hollywood after his record-breaking engagement at the Hotel Astor in New York and some very profitable one-nighters. His next picture for M-G-M may be "Trumpet Man," a semi-biographical story of Harry's life. Incidentally, "The Horn" was sued in Los Angeles recently by Helen Ward, his ex-vocalist, who claimed Harry broke his year contract with her after only five months. Helen says she isn't mad at Harry personally—but, after all, "business is business."

The Jimmy Dorsey band finished their chores in Metro's "Lost In a Harem" and treked over to Warner Bros. for a big musical spot in "Hollywood Canteen."

Dick Haymes will be Betty Grable's leading man in "Diamond Horseshoe," her first picture since becoming a mamma. Dick's beautiful wife, Joanne Marshall, has been turning down movie offers on the average of one a week. Richard says "No."

Deanna Durbin is all smiles because her new picture, "Can't Help Singing," will have a wonderful score by Jerome Kern.

Frank Sinatra really started something with this swooner crooner business. In "Here Come The Waves," the Bing Crosby-Betty Hutton picture now shooting, Bing plays a Sinatra-like character who joins the Navy to escape the girls. And Paramount has started production on "Out Of This World," in which Eddie Bracken will portray a crooner boy. But when you see Eddie give out with the sighing tones, you'll be hearing Bing's voice—for "The Groaner" is doing all the recording.

Speaking of Sinatra, wait until you get a load of him in a sailor suit dancing a horn pipe with Gene Kelly in his Metro picture, "Anchors Aweigh." Frank plays the part of a lonely gob who can't get a date with a girl. (That's a switch). Gene has been teaching Frank his dance routines. Tripping the light fantastic must agree with "Glamour Boy" because he has gained weight. Or maybe it's the California climate.

DRAGON SEED

PRODUCED on a large and impressive scale, "Dragon Seed" runs two hours and 25 minutes and depicts the drama of Chinese peasants rising to resist the Jap invaders.

There are stirring climaxes aplenty, and tense moments more vivid than any warfront newsreel, as gradually the people are led from a general attitude of passive resignation to one of active resistance, combining in force.

One witnesses the revolt of the old against the new, the progress forged in the gigantic struggle for self-preservation. The film picks up the theme of the Pearl Buck story and develops it even further—giving a title, "All Men Are Brothers," to the unnamed book mentioned in the novel.

But if setting the mood and interpreting the people was the intent of the rather slow to unfold preamble to the real first act of the drama, we must question the success of the attempt; for the Occidental representation of Chinese characters—however fine their acting and their costumes and make-up—is not always convincing.

Katharine Hepburn, Walter Huston, Aline MacMahon, Akim Tamiroff, Agnes Moorehead, Turhan Bey and Henry Travers have the principal roles. Mr. Huston is the farmer Ling Tan; Aline MacMahon, his obedient wife; Miss Hepburn is Jade, the wife of Ling Tan's second son (Mr. Bey); Tamiroff is the son-in-law who becomes the local Quisling; and Miss Moorehead, the wife of a third cousin.

J. Carrol Naish, Hurd Hatfield, Robert Bice, Frances Rafferty and Robert Lewis handle the supporting roles.

OUR HEARTS WERE YOUNG AND GAY

TAKEN from Cornelia Otis Skinner's book of the same name, the film version of "Our Hearts Were Young and Gay" is authentic for the most part, and the incidents which have been added are every bit as "really funny."

Gail Russell portrays Miss Skinner with a smooth finesse and a flair for deadpan comedy not revealed in her two previous screen appearances. Diana Lynn breaks out of her kid-sister roles in the part of Emily Kimbrough, and her brand of chatter is delightful.

The story, as probably you know, is of two teen-aged American girls who tour England and France, after the last war, without much benefit of chaperones. The complications that arise are unbelievably, rib-ticklingly mirth-making: the measles on board ship, the innocently stolen pocketbook, the bout with the "geyser" in the English boarding house bathroom, the purchase of the rabbit coats, and the night spent atop the steeple of Notre Dame.

Light romance is provided by Jim Brown and Bill Edwards, two completely bewildered young males who become entangled with these unpredictable sub-debs on board ship, and follow them on their tours.

The film moves at such a rapid pace that it seems much too short, although it is of standard length. There just aren't enough adjectives available to describe "Our Hearts." We can only say that it is an extremely funny picture, and recommend it highly.

(Selznick-United Artists)

SINCE YOU WENT AWAY

MORE often than not, in the past year, the "long anticipated" movies have come off being something less than was promised. So even if "Since You Went Away" seems not to compare as we were led to expect with David Selznick's two previous epics—"Gone With the Wind" and "Rebecca"—you won't be too disappointed.

Nor will it further or detract from the movie careers of any one of the stars in the all-star constellation. Jennifer Jones, whose Academy Award-winning Bernadette performance left many critics wondering whether or not the young lady could handle a more conventional role with equal brilliance, and Shirley Temple, who's playing her first really important part since outgrowing her tiny-tot successes—in neither case does this render a verdict.

The three-hour story is an emotionally effective though ramblingly overdrawn study of an American family in wartime. In 1943, to be exact, when Mrs. Hilton (Claudette Colbert) says goodbye to her army captain husband. Jennifer and Shirley are the Captain's young daughters, Jane and Bridget. Joseph Cotten is the dashing naval lieutenant, friend-of-the-family "uncle"; Robert Walker, the squirmingly shy young corporal who falls in love with our sweet, girlish Jennifer; Monty Woolley, the crabbed "man who came to dinner," paying lodger; and Agnes Moorehead, the venomous matron-about-town.

Especially consistent and thoroughly convincing are Hattie McDaniels, the family cook, and Soda, the dog.

THE SEVENTH CROSS

BASED upon the novel of the same name, this is one of the most gripping stories of Nazi Germany to come out of Hollywood. It is a deeply powerful, intense film—not a war picture, but rather the story of Germany in 1936, under the iron heel of the Nazi rule. It concerns seven men, all anti-Nazi, who escape in that year from a notoriously cruel concentration camp. The camp officials build seven crosses in the courtyard, and eventually six of the men are captured, beaten and tied to the crosses.

Spencer Tracy portrays George Heisler, the man for whom the seventh cross is waiting, and the picture traces his efforts to find someone who will help him to escape the country. Before his internment, George Heisler was a great man—a man who was a leader—but the tortures of the camp have dulled his brain, and more important, his faith in human nature. He is desperate, hating his countrymen, and ready to commit murder to escape. He is incapable of understanding the motives of the few who help him. Gradually, though, he learns that there is, in some men, a spark of decency that cannot be quenched.

As a film about Nazi Germany, it is a relief that the Nazis, although brutal, are not depicted as super bogeymen. Instead, it is a more authentic portrayal of human beings under the Nazi rule.

Everyone in the picture deserves special mention for a job well done. Hume Cronyn, as the naive and boyish Paul Roeder; Signe Hasso, as the girl Heisler leaves behind; Jessica Tandy, as Roeder's wife.

that for nearly a year she was by way of being the juke box queen of Los Angeles county. She had inherited a string of fifty locations when her husband, Leonard Behrens, went into the Navy. Manfully she tried to purchase recordings, secure a reliable service man, and increase her chain of nickel snatchers.

To do this she marched boldly into Victor's (celebrated Hollywood steak house) one night and tried to sell the maitre d'hotel the notion of installing a juke box. He roared.

Not in the least discouraged, she made the same suggestion to the swank Copa de Oro management. No, they said, they weren't interested. Grinning, Mary skipped it. The whole enterprise was costing her a nice hunk of her motion picture salary each week, and still not keeping all boxes in running order, so she sold out.

Offhand, what would you say had been the unchanging top juke box favorite during the last five years? Chances are, your guess is wrong. The answer, according to Mary, is "San Antone Rose."

DIET FOR BACHELORS

When Mrs. James Craig, with The Bub, went east for a long-delayed visit with relatives, Jimmie's last words, shouted from the railway platform, were: "Don't worry about me. You know what a good cook I am. I can take care of my own meals."

When Mrs. Craig returned, she regarded her husband's figure suspiciously. "Haven't you put on a little weight?" she asked.

"What can you expect of a diet of spaghetti and hot cakes!" countered Jimmie. "You know what I like to cook."

NEWCOMERS YOU SHOULD KNOW

The name Joyce Reynolds may not mean much to you at present, but when "Janie" is released (the picture in which Miss Reynolds gets her picture break), you will probably agree with Warner Brothers that Joyce's is a fancy face with a future

Joyce has always wanted a fur coat, so after she had collected several fat pay checks she went importantly down to a swank furrier and bought a fox stroller. A few weeks later she was told that she was to go to New York to make personal appearances in connection with the release of "Janie." Blissfully she commented on the news: "Now I'll REALLY get some good out of my fur coat."

Her studio advisers gawped. "A fur coat in New York in Summer!" they gasped, quickly turning on the nearest electric fan "Oh no!"

"Oh yes," said Joyce, and away she went to New York, resplendent in her foxes.

EXACTLY RIGHT

When Bette Davis was preparing to play "Miss Moffat," the austere school teacher in "The Corn Is Green" she read an article by author Emlyn Williams telling something of the book's background as related to Mr. Williams' own experiences. Reproduced with the article was a picture of the Welsh school teacher who had served as the unconscious model for the fictional Miss Moffat. Bette clipped the picture, took it over to Perc Westmore, and asked that her hairdo and makeup parallel as closely as possible the appearance of the teacher.

Handsome six-footer John Dall plays "Morgan." He was recruited from the New York stage production of "Eve Of St. Mark." Incidentally, William Prince was first enticed from the cast by a picture contract. Then Bill Eythe, who replaced Prince, was signed. Then John Dall, who replaced Bill, was contracted. Snatch Four will doubtless be re-[illegible] soon.

asks to be taken on the set to see Miss Goddard: at times this held up production, so Mr. Leisen decreed that his was to be a closed set. To prove that he meant it, he had huge badges struck off and issued to those who were necessary to the process of the picture. Even the publicity department personnel, badgeless, were turned back at the door. An error.

Probably the most open set on the lot is that on which jovial producer-director Mark Sandrich is shepherding Bing Crosby, Betty Hutton and Sonny Tufts through the script of "Here Come The Waves." When Mark and Bing decided to visit the "Kitty" set during a lighting change for their own picture, THEY, too, were put in their places—only those wearing badges were to be admitted, no matter how familiar the face.

Bing and Mark rolled their gum to the other side of their mouths and exchanged long glances. Then they got busy on Bing's dressing-room telephone. The next morning every member of the crew and cast and any visiting official from whatsoever department was equipped with a magnificnt armband initiated M.S.P.—Mark Sandrich Productions. Then the cameraman shot several feet of activity on the set and certain arrangements were made in projection rooms, etc. That night, when Mr. Leisen viewed his own rushes for the day, they were interrupted by a sequence from "Here Come The Waves"—armbands rampant.

LULLABY:

Alec Templeton has spent as much time as possible for the past year, visiting government hospitals to play for the wounded. His very presence and performance—since he sees with his heart and not with his eyes—is a tremendous morale builder.

Recently he toured a hospital in which most of the patients were vigorously convalescent. The boys greeted Alec's ability to switch from Cow Cow Boogie to Beethoven with cheers, whistles, and frantic applause. In ward after ward he was given a vociferous ovation.

Finally one of the nurses said, wheeling his portable piano into what was—to judge by the echoes—a large room, "Play in here for a moment, will you?"

Templeton, smiling toward the beds, gave them jive interlaced with Rachmaninoff. When he lifted his hands from the keys there was no sound from any direction save the dying echoes of the piano.

The nurse said casually, "Something soft."

So Alec, a small perplexed frown furrowing his forehead, played Brahms, then Bach, then two or three ballads. He lifted his hands, turning his head toward the direction from which he usually heard applause. Only silence.

He turned to suggest to the nurse that he leave when he heard a sound: faint, weak, pleading. "More," it breathed in the still room. And from another direction sighed the same word: "More."

The sensitive Templeton muted his keys, but swung into his regular routine: boogie woogie that augmented into Chopin. Debussy that lapsed into swing. Then he paused, and once again the almost inaudible gasp said, "More."

For nearly an hour he played, then the nurse once again moved the piano.

In the corridor, she explained. The ward was filled with patients so mutilated or so intimate with death that no other visitor had ever been permitted to enter. It was known that the least excitement might sever the thin strand that still trembled with life; but, also, it was felt that, through the music, one of the men might be recalled . . . that was the chance worth taking.

The whispered, fragile word, breathed from the scattered beds had been the answer.

LETTER OF THE LAW:

Jane Wyman and her subdeb daughter, Maureen Reagan, were spending an afternoon in the backyard recently. Maureen has been cautioned repeatedly about the dangers of the swimming pool, so usually she doesn't approach it unless accompanied by one of her parents. On this afternoon, however, she was fascinated by the reflection of an airplane lazily crossing the sky.

Jane glanced up to see her towhead, standing precariously on the small cement walk that borders the pool. She called sternly, "How many times have you been told that you must stand on the GRASS, Maureen?"

With a nod of obedience, Maureen stepped away. Several moments later, Jane scanned the scene to find that the young lady had repaired to a mound of newly cut grass, gathered a great armload, placed it as near the edge of the pool as possible, and was standing on it while she grimaced at the ingenious water sprite reflected in the pool.

ROVER BOY:

When the original press releases were planted on Richard Jaeckel, the cotton-top who played "Chicken" in "Guadalcanal Diary," it was stressed that he had been "discovered" while he was working in the studio mail room. To add oak leaf clusters of fantasy to this statement of fact, some Horatio Alger dreamed up the canard that Dick Jaeckel was supporting his mother.

As a matter of fact, svelte, witty, social Millicent Jaeckel could, if she cared to sell them, live for years on the proceeds from the disposal of her furs, alone. (No one will ever understand why motion picture personnel with unimpeachable claims to plushy backgrounds are represented as section hands, whereas the Tizzie Zilches from Goat Alley abruptly accumulate Spanish Convent histories.)

But to get on with our story: during the recent bond drive, the employees of the mail room hit upon a novel plan to put their department in first place in the studio contest: they telephoned Mrs. Jaeckel and asked her if she would buy, say a few hundred dollars' worth of bonds. Yes, agreed Mrs. Jaeckel with alacrity. She had been planning to invest three thousand dollars, and she would make her purchase through the mail room.

The mail room, arising to dash the ice water from its revived face, went hurtling through the halls of 20th Century Fox, spreading the news and suggesting that an item be planted in each of the syndicated columns, applauding Dick's mother.

Arose, then, the publicity department to protest. How were they to represent their fair-haired boy as a sturdy provider, if news leaked out that his mother was investing lavishly in bonds for the benefit of her son's old alma mammy, the mail room?

Well, the mail room got credit, but—in publicity released for the event—Mrs. Jaeckel was described simply as "the mother of a former employee."

DAMON & PYTHIAS DEPARTMENT:

One of the most pleasant new friendships around town is that between the Alan Ladds and the Joel McCreas. Alan Ladd had long admired Mr. McCrea from a distance, so when they went to work on adjoining sound stages at Paramount, Alan went over and got acquainted. Now they have breakfast together each morning in the Ladd dressing room, and they have taken a house jointly at the beach for the summer. The Ladds are to have it for six weeks, and the McCreas the other six weeks, but during week-ends of both tenures, they will make a huge family group and occupy the house together.

Guess what they talk about. Ranching. Everyone knows that Joel McCrea has made a great success of what started as a hobby. Alan would like to emulate him.

TAG LINE:

If you want to spend a little time worrying about the strange fellowships arranged by motion pictures, you might reflect on the situation that places Jimmy Durante and Jose Iturbi in the same picture.

Someone asked The Schnozzle what he thought of The Keyboard Master. Answered Mr. Durante in his breeze-over-an-open-bottle baritone, "What a straight man, that Iturbi! What a straight man!"

Joyce Reynolds in New York, and sharing a glass of milk with Private Bobby Breen.

Let these guys start it!

There's a day coming when the enemy will be licked, beaten, whipped to a fare-thee-well—every last vestige of fight knocked out of him.

And there's a day coming when every mother's son of us will want to stand up and yell, to cheer ourselves hoarse over the greatest victory in history.

But let's not start the cheering yet.

In fact, let's not start it at all—over here. Let's leave it to the fellows who are doing the job—the only fellows who will know when it's done—to begin the celebrating.

Our leaders have told us, over and over again, that the smashing of the Axis will be a slow job, a dangerous job, a bloody job.

And they've told us what our own common sense confirms: that, if we at home start throwing our hats in the air and easing up before the job's completely done, it will be slower, more dangerous, bloodier.

Right now, it's still up to us to buy War Bonds—and to keep on buying War Bonds until this war is completely won. That doesn't mean victory over the Nazis alone. It means bringing the Japs to their knees, too.

Let's keep bearing down till we get the news of final victory from the only place such news can come: the battle-line.

If we do that, we'll have the right to join the cheering when the time comes.

Keep backing 'em up with War Bonds

To People who want to write
but can't get started

Do you have that constant urge to write but the fear that a beginner hasn't a chance? Then listen to what the editor of Liberty said on this subject:

"There is more room for newcomers in tha writing field today than ever before. Some of the greatest of writing men and women have passed from the scene in recent years. Who will take their places? Who will be the new Robert W. Chambers, Edgar Wallace, Rudyard Kipling? It is also true that more people are trying to write than ever before, but talent is still rare and the writer still must learn his craft, as few of the newcomers nowadays seem willing to do. Fame, riches and the happiness of achievement await the new men and women of power."

Mother of 4 Earns $1000 on her Writing

"Without jeopardizing our home life a bit, I have been able to earn $1000 since graduating from N.I.A. If I had not the responsibility of four small children, home duties, haphazard health and war work, I am sure I could have made much more. After only two lessons, I sold a garden series to Baltimore American. The N.I.A. way makes writing child's play."—Gladys Carr, Annapolis, Md.

Movieland's AWARD

"No. 1 Comedienne" smiles and rolls her eyes as she accepts the mike from Doris Cline of Movieland.

Joan Davis jes' notcherly cuts up for "birdie" when she hears she's 1944's best lady comic!

"THIS is my lucky year!" says Joan Davis of 1944. Movieland picks Joan as the number one comedienne of radio and screen. In 1944 she has achieved star rating in motion pictures, having been signed to a two-picture-per-year contract at RKO-Radio and Universal studios.

This year also marks the first in which she has starred on her own radio show, during which time she has amassed a Crossley rating of 32.4—the highest rating ever achieved by a woman.

Of course, Joan has helped destiny along by experimenting with her career.

"Something inside me kept saying that I could find a new type of comedy that would be an improvement over the slap-stick stuff," she explains. "So I started trying out what they call situation comedy. I worked with the writers on the show to get a new character that would be a believable Joan Davis."

The hunch was right!

But aside from radio, Joan has wanted to be a motion picture actress as long as she can remember. Attractive though she is—and she does have dramatic possibilities—she decided that her best chance lay in the field of comedy.

She has studied diligently the style of every stage and screen comedian. From this she has been able to develop her own individual style, which no one to date has imitated successfully. It's Joan's excellent sense of timing, her deft combination of sight and sound, which gets her laughs.

Her first screen role was that of a hillbilly in a short entitled "Way Up Thar," directed by Mack Sennett. This was in 1934. Next came "Millions in the Air" and a long-term contract with 20th Century-Fox. At Fox she starred in "Love and Hisses," "George White's Scandals," and about thirty other major films.

Her latest picture is "Show Business," in which she co-stars with Eddie Cantor.

Her radio career, which began in 1941, has made radio history. She "guested" on eight major broadcasts in one week—actually appearing on nine, when her own show is included. In that one week she visited "People Are Funny," "National Barn Dance," "Hedda Hopper's Hollywood," "Blondie," "Al Pearce Fun Valley," "Duffy's," "Eddie Cantor's Show," and the Bing Crosby program.

YOUR PROBLEM AND MINE

very much. At first he loved me very much too I am sure, but then he started to go around with a friend of mine, who is homely and unattractive, while I am considered very pretty by my friends.

I am sure she is just trying to get him away from me because I have more friends than she has and I am more attractive, and I really don't think he likes her as much as he likes me.

I have always been very shy and find it hard to keep a conversation going with boys, and perhaps that is one reason I can't hang onto a boyfriend for very long. What do you suggest?

Yours truly,
Mary K.

Dear Mary:

In the first place, I think you should forget how pretty you are and concentrate more on your sociabilities.

You can try and overcome this lack of conversational ability and shyness by getting out with a lot of people and making more friends rather than spending your time and thought trying to win back a boyfriend.

The old adage that "beauty is skin deep," may sound trite, but it still holds true. You must have more to offer a boy than good looks if you want him to come back and date you again.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Bonita:

Although I am just in my 'teens, I am deeply in love with a boy I have gone all through school with.

He exasperates me sometimes because he is so "slow," but my friends say he really does like me a lot.

One night he brought me home from a date and tried to kiss me. He was awfully embarrassed about it, and as I had never been kissed by a boy before, I just sort of changed the subject.

The trouble is that he hasn't come back or called me since that night, and I am nearly crazy wondering what to do.

Yours truly,
June.

Dear June:

I wouldn't worry about this situation too much. You are inclined to make a mountain out of a molehill about it.

He sounds like a wonderful boy, and he is probably shy and wondering if he offended you by trying to kiss you that night.

You say he was embarrassed about it, so you can guess that he must be remorseful in thinking you like him less for it.

Include him in your next gathering of a group of friends—sort of casually—and I am sure he will be a happy friend of yours again.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Miss Granville:

My girl friend and I have a very serious problem and we would appreciate your help and advice.

We are only fourteen years old, and there is another girl on the block who always comes around to play with us and wants us to go around with her all the time, but our mothers have forbidden us to go around with her anymore, and we must tell her but don't know how.

You see, she goes around with soldiers, and lots of times she brings them to meet us on the street, but we know we are too young to go around with them.

We have tried and tried to get enough courage to tell this girl, but we can't.

Cordially,
Bobbie and Gerry.

Dear Bobbie and Gerry:

Yes, you should definitely take your mother's advice and tell your friend you can not go around with her anymore.

As you grow older, you will come to realize that people judge you by the friends you have and are seen with.

Hence, if this girl is not the right kind for you, do not hesitate to come right out and tell her. It is a hard thing to do, but you are old enough to make these decisions and carry them out.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Miss Granville:

My problem concerns my hair, and I do hope you can give me some advice as to what to do with it.

You see, although I am not yet seventeen, I have gray hairs on my head. Yes, real gray hairs, and although I tried pulling them out with tweezers they only grow in that much quicker.

What can I do about this? Should I dye my hair from time to time? It is dark brown now, and I try to part it so the gray won't show but I haven't much luck.

Hopefully,
Bernice.

Dear Bernice:

By no means touch up your hair. Natural hair is always more beautiful than dyed hair, regardless of the color.

As for your grayness, have you stopped to realize that prematurely gray hair can be a very attractive feature for a young girl?

I have a young friend who is completely gray and not yet thirty. She is the wife of one of Hollywood's most popular leading men, and she is conceded to be one of the smartest women in town.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Bonita:

I am sixteen, and my problem is that I want to become a writer.

I have done writing in school, and I would like to do screen and radio writing.

Do you think if I came to Hollywood that there would be a chance for me to get a job doing this kind of writing?

No one encourages me to write, but I know I can do it, and I want to write more than anything.

Yours truly,
Susan.

Dear Susan:

If you are really interested in writing, study the problems seriously, read all you can, and get what practical experience is available in your local schools.

Perhaps your local paper might let you write school news for them, or help out on Saturdays.

The field you mention is practically filled up with experienced writers all the time, so I do not advise you to come to Hollywood. Get your experience in your home town and at school, and go on from there. Good luck.

Sincerely,
BG

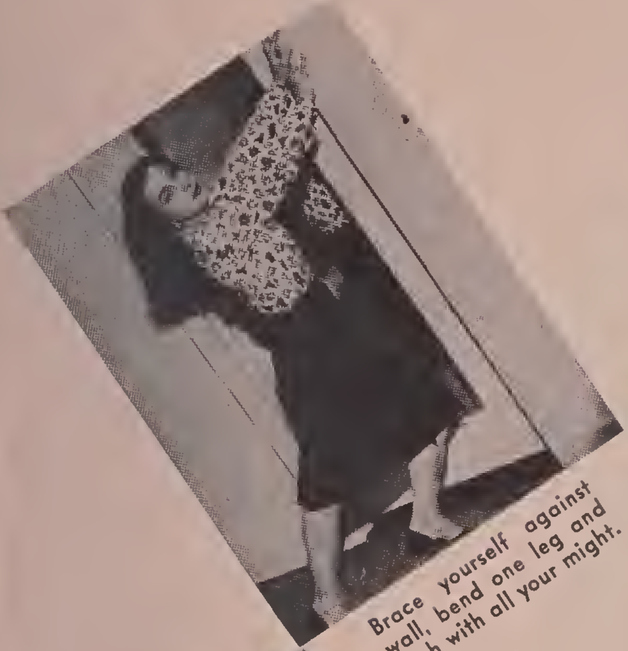
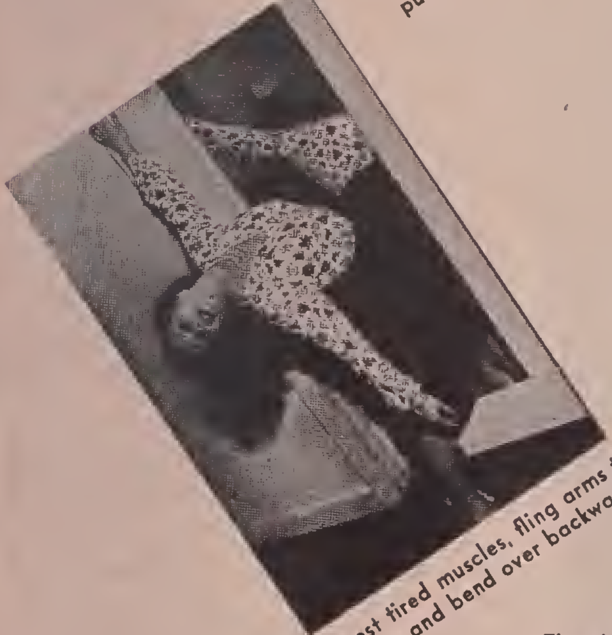
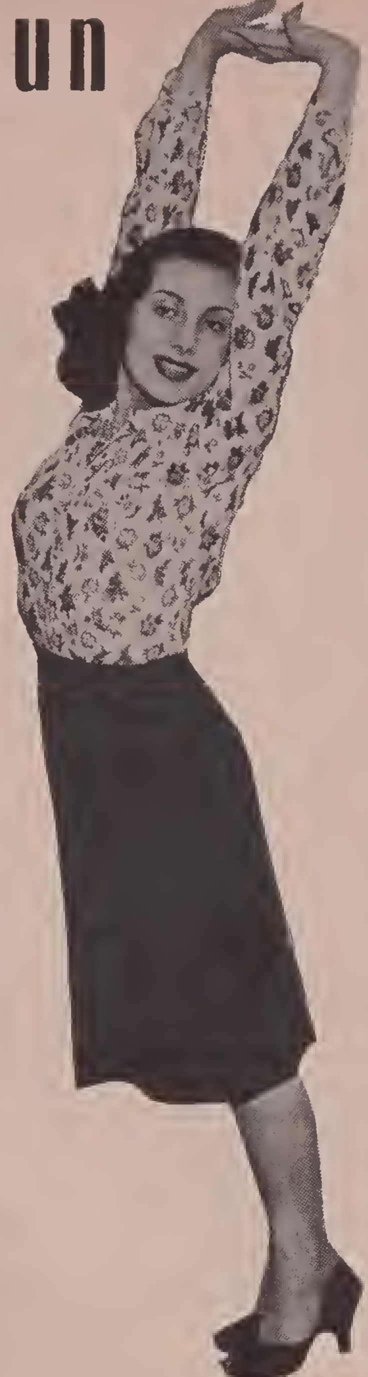
Rest On The Run



Brace yourself against wall, bend one leg and push with all your might.



To rest tired muscles, fling arms to the side and bend over backwards.



The sleepy stretch thot feels so good. Honds are locked, orms ore up, diophragm pulled in.

SOUNDS strange, doesn't it, to put your muscles to work when you—and they—are tired. Yet this is the magic-making formula that helps to keep graceful dark-haired Tamara Toumanova in the pink of vivacious condition.

For thirteen years, Tamara has been in the public spotlight. Since she was seven years old (when she made her dance debut with Pavlova in the Paris Opera), she's lived a life as busy as a presidential candidate and as rigorous as a circus acrobat. So you've got to admit that she has to know how to relax.

Tamara's relaxing routine is a one-two-three process that takes about five minutes. The first step is the stretch. When muscles are fatigued, they become limp in some places, tense and tight in others. A good stretching evens out these muscular hills and valleys.

How to stretch? There are a hundred ways. You can stretch one muscle at a time—or ten. But for the quickest kind of pick-up, be sure to breathe deeply as you do it.

For the second step, relax one muscle after the other, starting with the neck. Let your head slump forward on your chest. Then let your arms fall limp. Relax the diaphragm muscles, the legs and the feet. Of course, by this time you're on the floor. And not even slightly shaken up! For when you're completely relaxed a fall can't hurt you.

Finish the formula by sending a rush of blood to your head. Lean over the side of your chair, or fling yourself on a couch with your head hanging over. The blood will course down to stimulate the brain, enliven the skin and wake up weary nerves.

Do you wonder how it works, this five minutes of rest on the run? Well watch Tamara Toumanova in RKO's "Days of Glory." You'll see the lovely litheness that only a well trained, well balanced body can achieve.

of a good meal, then as now, was a steak, plenty of bread and butter, and a spot of tea. If he never saw another vegetable as long as he lived, he admitted that he wouldn't be lonesome. As for Betsy, she liked everything and ate it without adding more than 110 pounds to her five feet seven inches of height.

When "Pal Joey" closed, Gene went to work at directing the dance routines for "Best Foot Forward." The company was opening in Philadelphia, so Betsy went down to visit, since she was free of commitments at the time. Gene had big news: he had signed a picture contract; he was going to Hollywood. And, he added, he didn't intend to go west alone.

They thought they would have six weeks in which to prepare for their wedding. But Hollywood, in typical fashion, wired Gene a request to be in California on a certain imminent date. He made some quick calculations and decided that their wedding couldn't even wait for the New York opening of the show.

Betsy and her mother went on a frantic shopping expedition. They bought an RAF blue suit with matching hat, a white blouse and a pair of white gloves. They also bought a beige afternoon dress. And that was the extent of Betsy's trousseau.

She wore the same shoes she had worn down from New York, and she borrowed an exquisite handmade handkerchief that had been sent to her aunt, many years earlier from Ireland. Thus she satisfied the traditional demand for "something old, something new, something borrowed, something blue."

They set out upon a honeymoon the like of which every girl anticipates. First they drove to New Orleans; they dined at Antoine's, they strolled through the narrow, mysterious streets of the Old Quarter and peered into the gardens protected by the frozen lacework of their grilled iron gateways. They heard stevedores singing at their work, and saw by moonlight groves of oak festooned with Spanish moss.

From New Orleans they took a freighter, shipping their car on the same boat, and landed at Vera Cruz. They motored over some highways that were mere oxen trails, and some that were modern marvels. They visited markets where peppers and mangoes and dozens of varieties of native fruits were spread out like a lush mosaic on the native blankets. They passed through towns with names like spiced honey: Orizaba, Tlaxcala, Puebla, thence to Mexico City.

Along this route, Gene impressed his new wife by producing an efficient knowledge of Spanish. He could bargain effectively and he could usually get what they wanted to eat—the tests of success in any foreign country. Both Gene and Betsy had studied Spanish in New York the previous winter, but Gene appeared to have a natural aptitude for language, making it easy for him to grasp instantly and with ease that for which Betsy had to struggle. (Currently, she is studying Russian.)

From Mexico City, they drove to Los Angeles, then to San Francisco. They had crab cocktails at Fisherman's Wharf, and wandered for an entire day along Grant Street's Chinatown. They exclaimed over the view from the Top of the Mark. They strolled through Golden Gate Park. In general they had a wonderful time, and they developed a conversation trick that has now become household habit. "Oh, look, Geney," Betsy would breathe. "At what, Sweeney?" Gene would answer, simply because it rhymed. Both nicknames have stuck.

When they returned to Hollywood they rented a tiny house on the side of a hill. The living room was so small that, when the ping-pong table was up, guests and Kellys had to scoot underneath to move from one room to the other. As if this weren't enough exercise, access to the Kelly home was by way of a long flight of stairs—about forty-seven of them. None of these reducing agents seemed to deter guests, however, because there were always dozens of people around.

There came a day when Betsy thought she ought to see a doctor. Gene was testing for the part in "Me And My Gal" opposite Judy Garland that day, and he had a stormy time of it. He couldn't keep his mind on the routines. He blundered and he apologized until the set telephone finally rang. "I hope it will be a girl," said Betsy, "but I suppose we should think up a lot of boys' names, just to outwit the stork."

After Gene had received the announcement, he returned to work like an inspired Nijinsky. Within an hour, practically everyone on the Metro lot knew why the dance test on Stage 14 had been choppy in the morning, but was now as brilliant as sun on a smooth sea.

Gene was deep in the photographing of the big production number for "Dubarry Was A Lady" when he received word that Betsy needed him. She had gone into the hospital the night before, but the doctor had thought it might be some time before Gene would be needed.

Upon arriving in the traditional waiting room, Gene set about what he described as "walking around," but which is more accurately termed "pacing." He smoked. He trotted, perspiring, down to the drug store for cokes. Finally he told Betsy's mother with some asperity, "I'm acting just like a father in a B picture."

A nurse thrust in her head to inquire, "Would you like to see your daughter, Mr. Kelly?"

His feet had left a note reading, Back In Fifteen Minutes, but he somehow managed to follow the nurse anyhow. For a long time he stood looking down at the plump citizen with the softly-curling brown hair. "Say, is she bowlegged?" he asked, worriedly.

"All newborn babies are bowlegged," smiled the nurse. "She's absolutely perfect."

"Her name is Kerry," announced the lady's father, rising to the occasion with full Irish responsibility.

In December, Kerry's mother will be twenty-one. Next year she will be able to vote in municipal elections, but she will have to wait four years for another presidential election. In preparation for such citizenship, she has been reading Charles and Mary Beard's books on American history—an activity started by Gene, whose reading is usually quite serious.

In addition to their dual reading habits, the Kellys maintain a twosome Casino tournament that has been going on throughout the three years of their marriage. When questioned about scores, Gene is eloquent on the subject of his superior card playing; he is positive that he must be about ninety games ahead of Betsy. Betsy thinks that, in the long run, they break even.

When guests are being entertained, which is practically every Saturday night in the Kelly home, a comfortable rented house in Beverly Hills, the gang plays Categories, or The Game, or they sit around and talk. Betsy sets out, buffet style, cheese and crackers, sliced cold turkey, olives, pickles, potato chips, and invites everyone to eat when and what he wishes.

This easy pattern is the only rule of the Kelly way of life: enjoyment without fuss. Gene doesn't fuss at Betsy if the house hasn't been dusted or if things aren't properly hung up, and she doesn't fuss at him if he doesn't shave for two or three days when he isn't working in a picture. Both of them hate to go to bed at night, and hate to get up the next morning.

And both agree that the next thing they want is a home of their own, which they will build after the war. That accomplished, they think it would be nice to have enough junior Kellys for a mixed quartet.

back in the vaudeville days, but split up before they get to the altar. Jack marries another girl and fathers two children, who grow up to be Donald and Peggy. Years later, his ex-fiancé appears on the scene, with Ann Blythe as her daughter. Of course, Donald falls for Ann, but there's an obstacle to the romance in the person of a ham actor who influences Ann and her mother.

There's some fine dancing by Donald and Peggy, and Ann Blythe contributes songs to the film. But on the whole, does it measure up to the previous O'Connor-Ryan pictures? We think not.

BRIDE BY MISTAKE (RKO) Rich girl seeking romance (Laraine Day), and concerned lest her money be more loved by marital aspirants than her own lovely self.

So, she switches identity with her secretary-companion (Marsha Hunt). Follows the rest of the all so familiar formula, with complications developing when a handsome army captain (Alan Marshall) starts courting Miss Hunt, supposing her to be the heiress.

Neither Miss Day nor Miss Hunt's new groom (Allyn Joslyn) like this turn of events. But Miss Day struggles determinedly on, refusing to drop the disguise. With resulting situations—augmented by the dismayed Mr. Joslyn's jealous spying on his wife—which keep the plot lively with amusing dialogue.

As light entertainment, this one rates being recommended.

TAKE IT OR LEAVE IT (20th Century-Fox) is comedy, simple and sweet. The short, short story of Phil Baker and the $64 question versus a young sailor (Edward Ryan), whose wife (Marjorie Massow) is about to have a baby. "About to," in this instance, means the most immediate future.

When Phil learns that the sailor is a papa-to-be, and needs a thousand dollars to pay the doctor, he gives the boy a break. After practically spelling out the answers up to $64, he gives him a chance at one more big pot after another.

Comes the climax: a seven-pound baby boy!

Includes interesting sequences from old films: a number from Shirley Temple's "Baby Take a Bow," a dance routine by the flying Nicholas brothers, and a riotous duet by Alice Faye and Betty Grable.

And there you have it!

DIXIE JAMBOREE (PRC) The plot centers around a couple of crooks, played by Lyle Talbot and Frank Jenks, who, to escape capture, hide aboard the last of the Mississippi showboats.

Romantic interest is furnished by Mr. Talbot and Eddie Quillan, a dumb trumpeter, who vie for the affections of Frances Langford, niece of the showboat owner. Dumb as he is though, Quillan comes out in the end as the hero of the picture, when he spoils the efforts of the two crooks to take over what they think is a priceless stock of liquor.

Guy Kibbee, as Miss Langford's uncle, and Charlie Butterworth turn in their usual good performances, although the lines they have to say don't do them justice.

It is regrettable that the dialogue doesn't succeed in being funny, but there are several entertaining musical numbers in the picture, and if you are one of Miss Langford's fans, just hearing her sing will make it all worth while.

JANE POWELL

a roseate glow arose from the house for days.

In no time at all, Suzanne was singing over station KOIN. Overjoyed Oregonians voted her the State Victory Girl, a position which imposed the obligation of singing at every possible public function as well as at nearby army camps. Then Suzanne's radio work found a sponsor—the owner of a jewelry store—so she became a full-fledged professional. Currently she wears a handsome black onyx ring set with diamonds, which was a gift from this sponsor.

By this time the entire family Burce was spinning along like a small boat on a spring flood; something tidal was happening to them, but they weren't quite sure what. The owner of station KOIN, with true altruism, decided that Suzanne should be in Hollywood and so sent the entire family south to appear on Hollywood Showcase.

They had never been in California before; they knew no one. Approaching the entire situation on mental tiptoes, they took a modest apartment in a conservative district in Hollywood (being properly grateful that, considering current housing conditions, they didn't have to pitch a pup tent in the Civic Center) and made an appointment at NBC. Could Suzanne, they wanted to know, please have an audition? They had a letter of introduction from Portland.

In Hollywood, good manners and diffidence always astonish officials in the entertainment business because they have grown so painfully accustomed to the bumptious arrogance of tyros. When the Burce family, soft-voiced and gently-bred, arrived with letters of introduction, the station authorities were ingratiated. When they heard Suzanne sing, they became genteelly hysterical with delight.

The next thing the Burces knew, Suzanne had been signed to appear on the Bergen show, and Metro had secured her name at the end of a contract. That done, they promptly changed said name. Suzanne Burce became Jane Powell, and Jane Powell went into the starring role of her first picture, "Song of the Open Road."

Long before the picture was released, Jane (née Suzanne) had added transcriptions of all her songs in the picture to her collection of recordings. Incidentally, she has a collection that would inspire many more-seasoned collectors with envy.

She had listened to the transcriptions again and again, noting minor flaws and working to correct such. Then, one afternoon, she and her parents were notified that "Song of the Open Road" was to be sneak previewed that evening in a neighboring town.

During the screening, Jane sat raptly, her hands tightly clasped in her lap, her lips moving over every line of dialogue that her pictured self spoke, her vocal chords tightening over each note joyously sung by her cinematic prototype. When the lights flashed on, Jane's mother turned to the young singer to say, "I thought it was good, didn't you?"

Jane's eyes were dew catching moonlight to glisten. She started to say, "Do you think people will like it?" but she had no voice. Only after she had swallowed a glass of water did she regain partial use of her sound equipment; she had worked harder getting that picture sneak previewed than she had making the original recordings.

She had entered the theatre as an unknown high school girl. She emerged as a celebrity, but the transition was a bit too rapid for her to grasp. A group of autograph hounds had remained in the lobby and grounds, and when Jane straggled out rather limply, they mobbed her. "Will you sign here?" they demanded. "And here." "And for me, too."

Jane looked from one to another in disbelief. In her football-game tones she managed to ask, "What for?"

This question had undoubtedly never before been propounded to autograph seekers. They returned Jane's stare with accumulated interest and dividends. "Well, you're Jane Powell, aren't you?" they said.

In addition to her modesty, Jane has a rare asset in her sense of humor. After a Bergen broadcast one Sunday, Ray Noble was kidding Jane.

"I'll tell you confidentially," he said in mock confidence to a group that had come backstage to congratulate the principals on the show, "that Jane deserves a lot of credit. Why, she wasn't even wearing shoes when she first came to Hollywood."

Without a break in tempo, Jane took it up by pointing to her spectator pomps. "And now look at the progress I've made: Shoes with even the toes covered!" she said solemnly.

Her complete naturalness and her healthy good spirits are partly the result of her own unspoiled personality, but mainly the result of the comradeship-with-authority relationship between Jane and her parents.

There are certain definite rules laid down for her conduct. These rules are explained and mutually discussed, then Jane abides by them without further question. She is allowed to have a permanent whenever her hair grows out enough to need it, but between-permanents she is expected to wash and set her own hair and to keep it in good condition.

She is allowed one date a week with a boy of her own age. On Friday night she is allowed to remain out until 12:30, if she is attending a private party. If she has gone to a movie or on any other twosome date, she is expected to come home after the picture and entertain her boy friend with recordings or a late snack in the kitchen.

Jane never drinks milk. She is mad about anything chocolate: candy, cake, ice cream sodas.

Second to her enthusiasm for chocolate is her admiration for murder mysteries. She can read one an evening and still not surfeit her appetite. Aside from that reading she tries to absorb "some really good book" about once a fortnight. She loved "A Tree Grows In Brooklyn" and she is now in the midst of "A Bell For Adano."

Ordinarily the greatest problem of feminine teensters is self-consciousness in one form or another. Jane is no exception. She can walk out before thousands of utter strangers and feel not the slightest qualm or stage fright. They are an Audience, hence as unreal as a motion picture audience is to the projecting screen. But it is almost impossible for Jane to sing before an assembly of boys and girls her own age; she simply goes to pieces. Her voice has to be controlled with all the rigidity of the technique she has learned; fingernails become those things she had before she was notified of her date to sing for her fellow ingenues and juveniles.

The things she wants most in the world at present are, in the order of their desired appearance: first, to learn tap dancing "and to be as swoopy as Fred Astaire"; second, to lose her baby fat, of which she has very little; third, to complete her charm bracelet, which is now heavier than a ton of elephants; fourth, to appear in many, many more Metro pictures; fifth, to fall in love and get married, preferably to a lieutenant in the Air Corps.

Lucky future man.

For ordinary uses, you may prefer one type of deodorant, your neighbor another. But for one purpose—important to you and to every woman—there's no room for argument.

WORDS OF MUSIC

the cast, chorus and orchestra from the Broadway production singing the wonderful Rodgers and Hart score, including such favorites as "My Heart Stood Still" and "Thou Swell."

The Merry Macs' new release is "Pretty Kitty Blue Eyes" and "Sing Me a Song of Texas," with a larger instrumental group than is usually heard behind them. The Macs are now on tour of Eastern theatres and army camps.

If you like blues, don't miss Lucky Millinder's new record, "Hurry, Hurry" and "I Can't See For Lookin'." "Hurry" is the big side, with a terrific vocal by a new boy, Wynonie "Mr. Blues" Harris.

Alfred Drake, the singing start of "Oklahoma," does "We're On Our Way" and "Army Hymn" (A Prayer For Soldiers) with Fred Waring and The Pennsylvanians. Alfred has been signed by Columbia and is set for a big picture buildup.

That jivin' man, Lionel Hampton, comes up with a new one—"Hamp's Boogie Woogie" and "Chop-Chop." Both sides heavily feature the Hampton two-finger piano.

Percy Faith and his orchestra have made a fine instrumental record of "Amor" and "Spring Will Be a Little Late This Year," both orchestrated in Kostelanetz style.

Kitty Carlisle, accompanied by Harry Sosnick's orchestra, is heard on two oldies, "Good Night Sweetheart" and "These Foolish Things." Kitty is now in Hollywood and may try pictures again.

Here's "Hurry, Hurry" again, backed up by "Naptown Boogie," with Christine Chatman and her orchestra. Christine is a colored pianist with a terrific left hand. She handles the vocals for both tunes.

Evelyn Knight is a new name on the Decca label. She has been a big hit at the Blue Angel night club in New York for months with an old song called "Dance With a Dolly" (With A Hole In Her Stocking). It serves as a vehicle for her first record, coupled with "Without a Sweetheart."

"Bing Crosby—Volume II"—from the Brunswick Collectors' Series. These are the last records Bing made for the old Brunswick Company before Decca took it over. If you've liked Crosby for a long time, and don't own some of his early recordings, you'll want this album. The tunes are: "Where the Blue of the Night Meets the Gold of the Day," "Faded Summer Love," "Dancing In the Dark," "Sweet and Lovely," "I Apologize," "Many Happy Returns of the Day," "At Your Command," and "Star Dust."

VICTOR:

"I'll Remember April" by Charlie Barnet's orchestra and Bob Carroll on the vocal is backed up by Alvino Rey's band doing "Don't Take Your Love From Me," with Yvonne King singing the lyrics. Both sides were recorded a couple of years ago. It's taken the beautiful "April" a long while to become popular, but it now looks set for a long Hit Parade run.

Here's "Amor" once more and "Gettin' Mighty Lonesome For You" by Wayne King's orchestra, a re-issue from Wayne's civilian days. He is now a major in the Army.

Sinatra fans will swoon with joy with the re-issue of The Voice's "Night and Day" and "Lamplighter's Serenade," with Axel Stordahl's orchestra. This disc was made when Frank was with Tommy Dorsey and was signed by Victor to make a couple of platters under his own name. Of course Frank now records exclusively for Columbia, but Victor has had so many requests for this one they have decided to bring it out again.

COLUMBIA:

Claude Thornhill's orchestra does "Moonlight Bay" and "There's a Small Hotel," with vocals for both tunes by The Snowflakes. This record was made about two years ago but hasn't been released until now. Though Thornhill is away from the musical scene for a time, being a Chief Petty Officer in the Navy, his records are still much in demand.

Les Brown's new release is "Out of Nowhere" and "Sunday," with Butch Stone singing the vocal.

Here's a Benny Goodman Sextet Album of eight sides. All the tunes have been released separately over a period of years and some of them have become collectors' items. The titles: "Rose Room," "Airmail Special," "Flying Home," "I Found a New Baby," "Poor Butterfly," "Grand Slam," "Wang Wang Blues," and "As Long As I Live."

Cab Calloway jumps in with "A SMO-O-O-OTH One" and "Let's Go, Joe." Incidentally, Cab has published a little booklet called "Calloway's Jive Dictionary." It contains all the up-to-date expressions of the hep "short-hairs." Your local music shop should have copies.

CAPITOL:

That Mercer boy, John, who can always be counted on to come up with something solid, has recorded his newest composition, "Duration Blues," with "Sam's Got Him" on the reverse side. The orchestra isn't credited on the label, but it's Eddie Miller's.

Benny Carter's new offering is "I'm Lost," a beautiful tune written by King Cole, and "Just a Baby's Prayer" with Savannah Churchill on the vocal chorus. This is Savannah's last record with Carter. She has left the band and will work as a single. June Richmond replaced her.

Ella Mae Morse has done a good job on "The Patty Cake Man" and "Invitation To the Blues." The "Cow Cow Boogie" girl is now on her second theatre tour, and doing very well.

Stan Kenton is with us again, this time on "How Many Hearts Have You Broken" and "Her Tears Flowed Like Wine." Gene Howard sings the first side and Anita O'Day does the honors on the second.

JAM NOTES:

Les Brown's former vocalists are doing all right for themselves in Hollywood. Roberta Lee was spotted by a Twentieth Century-Fox talent scout while singing at the Trocadero and was tested for a contract. Hal Derwin landed the singing berth on the new "Glamour Manor" daytime show over the Blue Network. And he has a new name, Hale Stevens. The Town Criers have been regulars on the Sunday night "Old Gold" program over N.B.C. They're one of the best quartets on the air today.

Skinnay Ennis has been discharged from the Army and is slated to return to the air with Bob Hope. . . . Pat Johnston, attractive blonde lyric writer of "I'll Remember April," was married recently in Hollywood to Herbert Evers, an actor. . . . Ted Weems is out of the Merchant Marine and has organized a new sixteen-piece band. . . .

Jan Garber's new singing click, Tommy Traynor, owes his start to David Street, the vocal star of the Joan Davis radio show. David had been coaching Tommy for months and when Jan needed a male vocalist Street talked him into taking Tommy, who was unknown. Tommy had never worked with a band before. . . . Freddie Slack is off on a theatre tour. Imogene Lynn, former Ray McKinley songstress, is with him.

PATRIOTIC CORNER:

Spike Jones and The City Slickers were the first civilian band to go overseas to entertain the troops. Spike's ambition is to be able to play "Der Fuehrer's Face" in the heart of Berlin. He had V-Mail copies made of his arrangement of the tune and took them with him to give to service bands. . . .

Dinah Shore bought a tiny portable piano for her overseas jaunt. It has only three and a half octaves and weighs about the same as an accordion, so it can be carried around easily. . . . Frances Langford has made another trip to the battle fronts with Bob Hope. She took along a glamour wardrobe which should more than please the G.I.'s. . . .

Martha Tilton's husband, Leonard Vannerson, former Tommy Dorsey band manager, now in the Navy in San Diego, had a good enough excuse when he asked his superior officer for a special pass. "My wife is going overseas," he pleaded, "and this is the last chance I'll have to see her before she goes." The officer said it was usually the husband who was going overseas, but that he would grant the leave because of the unusual procedure. So Martha and Leonard had a week-end together, before she took off for the South Pacific with the Jack Benny troupe. . . .

That's all for this time. If you have any musical questions that are troubling you, send them along and I'll attempt to straighten you out. But, please, just the musical ones. I can't tell you everything from Lana Turner to Lassie and still keep you posted on the bands and crooners. OFF THE RECORD presence of Jackie, sitting behind the Judge's bench, was humiliating to these real-life Boys of the Streets. Baby gangsters, teen-aged thugs, second and third offenders most of them, their hardened young faces would go white or red when they suddenly spotted him, and their bravado choke into a mumble.

It was a shock when we saw that the most shamed and miserable boy in the room was Jackie, himself. He sat with lowered head, deeply conscious of his own fame and good fortune, his instinctive good sportsmanship sparing these young misfortunates the embarrassment of his gaze. No homes, no jobs, almost always no mothers—and until her death, a few years later, Jackie's mom was his very best pal. Presently we saw two large tears slip down his face. He put up a quick hand to brush them away, and looked sidewise out of his lowered eyes to see if he had been observed. We hadn't seen a thing, of course—one good sport deserves another, we always say.

Crying at weddings is a habit all women have, but we saw a glamour girl reverse the proceeding and cry at her own wedding. Rita Hayworth, who when she was born to fame and beauty was also endowed with those gifts of simplicity and human-ness generally reserved for less gorgeous females, was the girl. It has been widely recorded that Rita was so nervous at her wedding to Orson Welles that the marrying judge had to ask the groom to hold her trembling hands in his own during the ceremony. Not much has been said, however, about the tears that brimmed her eyes when she was pronounced Mrs. Welles, nor her explanation of them to a close friend later:

"I cried because I was happy," she said, "—and I've had so much un-happiness, you know!"

It is true that two careers do not always a happy marriage make, but no reporter could be so hardboiled as to want to inject a note of inharmony into the happy welding of those two swell kids, Jane Wyman and Ronald Regan. In the days when Ronnie was not yet Captain Regan, and when Janey was still a bride, the two of them were members of a personal appearance troupe appearing at the Chicago Theatre. When the stars were entertained at a luncheon by a local advertising club, the groom was unable to attend because of a sore throat. The toastmaster, explaining the fact, made a heavy-handed attempt at humor:

"His bride will tell you about him," he said. "The former Mr. Regan is now Mr. Jane Wyman, you know!"

Janey popped to her feet like a cork out of a fizz-water bottle, and turned directly to the press table.

"Please, people," she said, her brown eyes blazing, "I hope you'll skip that introduction. Why, gosh—Ronnie would just break my neck if he thought I'd take a bow on a statement like that!"

Well, Janey still has her pretty neck, hasn't she?

Wiliest of all actresses, showwoman supreme, is Tallulah, the Great Bankhead. We are reminded of the time when, after having ignored the cornbelt for years, Taloo suddenly brought her latest legitimate hit to Chicago, and immediately tossed a large cocktail for the press. With her gaunt, rather hungry face contrasting her generous red mouth, and restlessly pushing a lank lock of hair back from her forehead as she talked, the Bankhead gave the impression that she was not a subscriber to sophistication, but rather, its inventor.

When the flash bulbs popped—at a time when most stars hurriedly push a drink out of sight—Tallulah calmly raised her "old-fashioned" to her lips, taking the only sip she took all afternoon. "I drink—" she said in that voice which comes from somewhere way down beneath her blouse buttons, "—or I don't drink. It's so unimportant—really!" Her suit, a little number characterized by its simplicity, was something that had obligingly wafted from a hotel shoppe window and settled on her shoulders just an hour before the party, she implied.

It was along about here that Miss Bankhead's secretary tiptoed importantly across the room and with no apology to the guests, whispered in her ear. At once, Tallulah broke into husky amusement.

"I don't need it this time, darling, really I don't—" she said. "You see," she went on, "so many of these parties turn out to be such terrific bores—you know the kind of thing I mean—so my secretary and I have developed a little ruse. She pretends I have a long distance call, and rescues me. But not today—uh-uh, I'm having too good a time! Thanks, anyhow, darling—"

The secretary tiptoed apologetically away — and the press, glowing with the warmth of their own unsuspected charm, dashed off to write their stories. Of course, there was always the chance that the "long distance call" was a ruse-within-a-ruse, with nothing but flattered reporters ever left in Tallulah's wake, but nobody thought of it until later.

Then there's Spencer Tracy. One midwinter when Spence was traveling from sunny California to blizzardy New York, he found it necessary to spend his Chicago between-trains time doing a little shopping. Mr. Tracy had goosepimples, and the press was perfectly welcome to come along while he bought himself some long underwear—red flannels preferred.

The department store he visited was fresh out of flannels, and there was even some difficulty in fitting their distinguished customer in just ordinary, pale woolen britches. Meantime, unknown to Tracy, the news of his presence had spread through every floor of the store with the legendary rapidity of a prairie fire. All of a sudden Spence, holding a baggy-seated union suit up under his chin, looked up to see the aisles crammed with females, their eyes fastened on him with worship slightly diluted with horror.

Non-plussed? Not Tracy! He threw back his head and laughed loud and long.

"That's where I've got it on those glamour-boys," he told us. "Now if it was Gable or Taylor who got caught like this, you could make something out of it. Me, I don't look any better out of a union suit than in one—so where's your story?"

One of our favorite unprinted stories about a Hollywood he-man concerns Jimmy Cagney. Nowadays when Jimmy is busily making personal appearances for his country's sake, few of his audiences realize that for many years he turned down thousands of dollars for doing practically the same thing. A vaudevillian for seven years before coming to the screen, Cagney nevertheless had an innate distaste for the footlights.

After one of his earlier pictures, however, he went East for a stage appearance with Joan Blondell, his co-star in the film. Traveling toward their engagement, Cagney worked up a fine case of jitters, thinking about that moment when he would have to dash out on the stage and go into the tough and cocksure action the fans would surely expect of him.

It was the zero hour—the time of their opening performance—and the pair stood waiting in the wings, ready for their cues. Jimmy got paler and paler, in the manner of a guy waiting for the signal to go over the top into a barrage of machine-gun fire. Finally, came the cue—and coincidentally, up came the luncheon Jimmy had eaten a short time before, and parked itself unbecomingly all over Joan's brand-new dress front.

We were not present at the christening, but we got the story from Chester Morris, who got it from Joan. Chester's imitation of Joan's imitation of herself, taking bows in front of that surprised audience whilst brushing off the remnants of Jimmy's table d'hote, is something to see.

"How do you do," said Joan (says Chester, with brushing gestures). "It's a pleasure to be here. (More brushing.) I am sorry to tell you that due to an unexpected—err, upheaval—Mr. Cagney has had to change his plans (working on sleeves, now). He does wish he could be with you—believe me, with all that's in him, he wishes it!"

"But speaking of tough guys"—that's an inevitable introduction these days for a Bogart anecdote.

It happened on Warner Brothers' gilded caravan to Dodge City (from the picture of the same name), at which time they took a private trainful of movie stars, picture executives and press representatives to premiere the film, and to stir the whole state of Kansas into almost unbelievable excitement. It was a crowded, exhausting day for the stars who attended—parading, speech making, pushing their way through thousands of autograph-seeking fans—and all of it with the thermometer about to blow its top. Sixteen long hours of this, and then the final event was over and everybody raced back to the train's club car for a drink of something long, strong and cool.

With the club car jammed and everybody shouting orders at once, it was discovered that the bartender was about to succumb to the heat. Sending the sick fellow off to his berth, the Bogarts took over. They stepped behind the bar, started rinsing glasses and filling them to order. They stayed there until almost morning, wiping off table tops, trotting back and forth on feet that had already done more than a full day's service—a couple of swell sports who found it easy to forget they were guests of honor, and waited on the "small shots" as well as the biggies.

There's another premiere story we never want to forget, and there's no longer any reason why it should remain "off the record." Alice Brady, its star, is dead, and Cesar Romero, supporting player, is helping the U. S. Coast Guards prove The Show Must Go On.

Our tale is a little drama played by these two at the gala first showing of "Young Mr. Lincoln," several years ago, at Springfield, Illinois.

Miss Brady was dying—slowly, and in complete consciousness of the fact—all the while the picture was being made. It was her secret, and the few friends who knew of her incurable disease helped her to keep it. Miss Brady, steeped in the tradition of the theater, thought it was her duty to bring pleasure to the world, rather than horror and pity. She made the four-day premiere trip under opiates, and went through every event of the hectic, heated final day the same way.

The parades, speeches, luncheons, all built up, as such things do, to that important moment before the picture's unveiling, when the stars stepped out onto the stage of the Springfield theater, and over a coast to coast hook-up, broadcast their greeting to the entire country. When Alice Brady faced that first-night audience she was the walking prototype of all the gaiety and glitter that is Hollywood's. Only a very few of the assembled celebrities on the stage knew that she was on the verge of collapse.

One of these was Cesar Romero, who sat next to her on the platform and could feel her trembling, and the shaking of the radio script held in her hand. Romero had had his own moment earlier in the program. Came the time for Alice to take her introduction, she stood up and swayed slightly, and immediately Cesar was on his feet with her. Taking her arm in cavalier manner, he walked to the microphone and flashing his white, Latin smile, came through with one of the most beautiful ad libs in history:

"Forgive me for trying to grab more than my share of the spotlight," he said to the spectators, "but you see, for years I've been trying to work up to the place where I could stand up and take a bow with as fine an actress as Miss Brady!"

"What a grand-stand player, that guy!" snorted a gentleman in back of us. Which was all right, since we knew the dapper Cesar would have been content to let the gentleman have it his own way, rather than the way it really was.

ALAN LADD

before starting. Nobody's having taken any sensible precautions with little Alan, the first thing I did was to help him get loose. Together, we decided to celebrate the Fourth by burning matches in a closet.

We kept burning them, then blowing them out. When we went to get more matches, we didn't notice that one was still burning, and by the time we got back there was a sheet of flame in the closet. The house burned down.

By the time the firemen arrived, my little playmate had wisely tied himself up to the tree again. I received the whole blame, and the fireman gave me a sound spanking. Mother just looked at me—she never spanked me for anything—but it was worse than the physical pain.

I was about to say that I've never been spanked from that day to this, but I take it back. I got a sound flogging from Bill Bendix, the other day, for a scene in "Two Years Before the Mast."

Anyway, to get back to the episode of the fire, it taught me something besides caution. I found that I loved excitement. So when the trip to California was proposed, I was all for it. We finally made the move, and without benefit of the Hit Parade decided to make the San Fernando Valley our home.

Times were tough and I had a lot of odd jobs: polishing vegetables in a market, working in a gas station, sweeping out a confectioner's shop. Maybe you could call that last a sort of character turning point.

I was ten years old, alone in the store at five in the morning, mopping up. It was the greatest temptation of my life, being exposed to all that luscious candy. But I never gave in and took any.

Not that I was a model child, by any stretch of the imagination. I was always getting into trouble at school, and always insisting that my harassed teachers take me to see the principal. I had discovered that my defiance made me a "big shot" in the eyes of the other kids.

There's no telling what would have become of me, if it had not been for a young teacher in high school who took a personal interest in me. I know now that meeting him was a turning point in my life. He had understanding, and soon set me straight. Because of him, I took my first interest in the school administration; I went in for athletics, I joined the Glee Club and the dramatic society. Soon I was much too busy with school activities to have any time for mischief.

It was my appearance in a school production of "The Mikado" that brought about the next turning point. Universal was looking for talent, and a scout remembered seeing me in the school show. I was asked to audition. Lasting until the finals in the elimination contest, I began to think I was definitely on my way to an acting career.

We rehearsed two weeks, then put on a sketch. Producers and writers sat in the audience, deciding which of the candidates should be tested, which ones discarded. I got along fine and was in the final group of ten.

Four of the group won contracts, but I wasn't one of them. Carl Laemmle, not looking particularly like a turning point, was seated in the first row. He said just one sentence: "I can't hear that boy."

I thought the world had come to an end, although I realize now it was the best thing that could have happened—I wasn't ready for acting yet. At the time, though, I thought I was through with acting for good.

I tried to get interested in something else, without much success. In turn I became a newspaper reporter, a restaurant owner, a salesman for a cash register company. Then came the next turning point. A friend asked me if I'd like to work as a grip at Warner Bros., and I took the job.

For two years I went around in my overalls, carrying a hammer and crowbar, content with my $42.50 a week. Then I began running into kids I'd met in the studio contest. They'd give me glowing accounts of the "bits" they were getting in pictures, their future hopes of stardom—and especially intriguing was their mention of the $50 a day they received for their "bits." I forgot to take into account that they probably worked only one or two days a year. I listened to them, and my $42.50 a week began to look sicker and sicker.

I went to dramatic school, determined to do the thing right this time. While I was a student at Ben Bard's, came the next turning point.

I was rehearsing for my first play, when my next door neighbor—I had moved to town by then—offered me the most wonderful opportunity that had yet come my way. He was with the Associated Press, and there was a position there for me if I wanted it. The day I had to start was the day our play was scheduled to open. That was a hard decision, not only because it was a fine job, but because I needed the money.

I lay tossing in my bed for three nights, trying to make up my mind. Finally, the night before the play opened, I gave my answer. I would take a chance on acting!

I'd never stuck to anything before, but this time I meant to see it through, come what may.

Plenty came—everything went wrong! I lost both parents, within a year of each other. Great acting opportunities were always just around the corner; they never materialized.

I finally turned to radio. And that was the next thing that changed the course of my life. It certainly didn't seem like any momentous decision at the time, however. I was getting all of fifty cents for a program, five dollars for a whole show. When KFWB later gave me $20 a week as their leading actor, I decided my future was in radio, not the screen.

It certainly seemed I was right when CBS offered me a contract. I set out for their office to sign, post haste, before they had a chance to change their minds.

In the meantime, Susy (she was just a name to me then—Sue Carol, an actors' agent who had been a film star) had heard me on the air and asked a mutual friend to tell me to see her. I wasn't interested; I had decided on radio.

But on my way to CBS I suddenly decided to stop and see Sue Carol. I thought it was just curiosity, but maybe it was Fate. Whatever it was,

I reached the second greatest turning point of my life the day I met Susy.

I had gone to see her only to tell her the screen was not for me. Instead, I heard myself asking for ten days to think it over. I made the same request at CBS, where they didn't bother to hide the fact that they thought I was crazy.

For ten days I thought it over, and finally I made up my mind. My future lay with radio. I knew what I wanted at last.

I stopped in to explain to Susy. She looked up at me.

"Well," she asked, "what have you decided?"

I heard myself answering: "Where's your contract?"

A spur of the moment decision I have never regretted.

That was an important turning point, and a happy one. We made a game of my career. For the first time in my life, I stopped stewing and fretting about every little thing.

I did a lot of "bits" and small parts after that. I never cared much about the size of a part, or should I say the lack of size. The important thing was to please the director. Maybe some day there'd be a real part, and he'd remember me. Could it be?

One such part I did, I call a turning point—because it was my first role on the Paramount lot. I've never mentioned it before. It was in the Fredric March picture, "Victory," and paid $100 a day. The only trouble with this great break was that the audience never saw my face. They photographed only the back of my head.

It was only a couple of weeks later that I reached a really important turning point. Three opportunities came my way all at once.

I had an offer from a commercial outfit to do a series of Army shorts, RKO wanted me to test for "Joan of Paris," and Paramount offered me a test for the part of Raven in "This Gun For Hire." After doing "bits" and small parts for so long, you can imagine how excited Susy and I were. We wanted to be sure we made no mistakes.

I tested for RKO and Paramount the same day. A few days later, I was at RKO and they told me I had the part in "Joan of Paris" and offered me a contract. I hadn't heard from Paramount yet, and I was all for signing. But I waited until Susy came over.

I knew the minute I looked at her that something was up. Her eyes were dancing. I told her the good news about RKO. Then she told me that she was talking a deal with Paramount.

We decided that I should do "Joan of Paris" without a contract, go away for three weeks to do the Army shorts, and then see what Paramount wanted to do.

It worked out beautifully. When I got home, I signed with Paramount.

The most important turning point after that was my induction into the Army, from which I've since received a medical discharge.

I learned a lot from the Army. For one thing, as I've said before, I've always been a great worrier. For the first time in my adult life, I found I couldn't control my own destiny. It would do me no good to stew; I had to take it.

It was a valuable lesson, and one I've profited from since returning to civilian life.

GREGORY PECK

companionable state, and there was always the stimulation of working and waiting for that big break."

Peck's first acting venture occurred at about the age of sixteen, when he took part in a high school revue. He was one of a chorus who added a few fancy touches to "Columbia, Gem of the Ocean," with gestures and dance-steps yet—which, come to think of it, was really enough to give even an unsensitive soul a complex.

"It was a terrible experience," he recalls. "I couldn't eat or sleep for three days before the performance.

"I was really a lonesome and painfully shy kid from about twelve to eighteen. I don't have any very pleasant memories of those years—except of my parents, of course. My mother always was very young and gay—and she still is. My Dad knew just how to deal with me. He gave me advice instead of orders.

"I remember that I decided to quit school when I was eighteen and go to work. I got a job with an oil company, and bought myself a Ford—felt pretty big. But when it came time to enter college, Dad didn't have much trouble talking me into it."

He didn't risk another joust with the footlights until he was forced into college theatricals through a series of disappointments. Enrolled in a premedical course at Berkeley's University of California, he discovered he lacked "the eagerness every good doctor should have." The world was robbed of the perfect bedside manner, no doubt—but in the light of subsequent events, we can't imagine anyone's kicking.

His next major interest had always been athletics. Rowing combined his love of competition and of the water, and he was rapidly becoming a regatta star when a spinal injury wrote finis to all but the mildest sports activity. If it is true that life has a definite and destined pattern, this last mishap, which made him pretty bitter at the time, was the beginning of the design for Gregory Peck. It was also the reason why army medics turned him down when he volunteered for military service shortly after Pearl Harbor.

The second time he stepped out in front of an audience was vastly different from the first.

"I was too young to analyze it then, but that was when I started to grow up. I ceased being afraid of people and the creative urge took hold instead. It wasn't Gregory Peck out there with hundreds of eyes staring at him—it was a character in a play they were looking at, and it was exhilarating to realize I could make that other person come alive for the people out front."

Undoubtedly young Peck had found himself, and when college was over he decided to give Broadway the privilege of making the same discovery. His assets consisted of a six foot two-and-a-half physique, topped by a restless shock of black hair and highlighted by that contagious smile, and one letter of introduction from his father to a business friend. Outside of that, he rode at the windmills of New York with only the thin lance of his courage.

For awhile, New York didn't even know it was being attacked. During this period he worked as a barker at the Fair, and quit when his voice began to take on an Andy Devine tinge. He applied for a position as guide in Radio City and quit when he realized that although he did plenty of walking, he was still in a stationary spot. Meantime, he'd won an audition for a scholarship at the Neighborhood Playhouse School of Dramatics.

After school came two years of stock, including an award engagement at the famous Barter Theater in Abingdon, West Virginia. The customers paid off in farm products—a dozen eggs, a pair of young hens, or even a hog.

It was at the Barter Theater that he was discovered by McClintic for road-playing—and although it was a long "road" that led to Broadway, it was McClintic who finally gave him a big-time lead in "Morning Star." But in spite of a distinguished cast, "The Star" soon disappeared behind the cloud of public indifference. Ditto for his next two Broadway ventures.

Whatever his future program calls for will find him perfectly agreeable, he says—"as long as they allow me to stick to human beings." His pet aversion is "people who act—you know, make faces—and put on or take off a mood as if it were an overcoat."

His favorite real-life heroes are Commander Scott, author of "God Is My Co-Pilot"; Roosevelt, Wendell Willkie, and the late Lou Gehrig. As a "dream leading-lady" he picks Ingrid Bergman, Teresa Wright or Claudette Colbert.

He's getting one of these "dreams," too, as the next picture you will be seeing him in will be the David O. Selznick production of "House of Dr. Edwardes," playing opposite Ingrid Bergman.

Gregory and wife Greta live in a house perched atop Coldwater Canyon, which they've christened "Wuthering Heights." They like to take walks, go horseback riding, entertain small groups of favorite friends. And unlike most husbands, this one loves to go along on a shopping tour. His favorite costume as lord of the manor is a pair of seven-year-old pants, a red-flannel shirt that "can almost stand up by itself," and tennis shoes. His favorite menu—when he can get it—is a charcoal broiled steak, a green salad with garlic dressing, lyonnaise potatoes, and ice cream. (No banalities—all essentials, see?)

His best fault, he admits modestly, is forgetting to comb his hair unless his wife reminds him.

When Gregory and Greta were married, he opined as how about six children would make the situation perfect. Greta, mindful that everything is being rationed nowadays, said she thought they could get along on about three offspring. They compromised, by agreeing on Greta's suggestion, and are currently wildly happy because the first of the young Pecks has arrived. A six-pound son!

Be it known, too, that your favorite leading man admits, with a sheepish grin, that it was wrong of him to suggest a family of six. He only did it because he had no idea, at the time, how a father must suffer in having his children!

What Colby wanted was something more lasting and substantial than either mere beauty or a slip of closely-printed paper with her signature on it. So, after a glimpse of Hollywood, she returned to New York and joined the gang on one of the top-ranking fashion magazines.

She was in and out of every department in the book. She was a dynamo and no kiddin'. She was night club editor and motion picture editor, to start with. She also dabbled in the promotion department, made lay-outs for the advertising department, created new fashions, secured new advertising accounts, handled public relations for the newspapers, and took care of all special entertainment and fashion shows. During all this, too, she also continued to model and appeared once in a while on the radio.

This went on for a couple of years—until March, 1942, to be exact. At that point, Colby was signed by Columbia Pictures to publicize and exploit and generally oversee a thing to be called "Cover Girl." Which you have no doubt cheered in your local theatre by now. She did this so well that she was ultimately hired by David O. Selznick for a job which he created especially for her. The title of this chore is Feminine Director of Selznick and Vanguard Productions. In simpler terms, it involves styling and grooming all the actresses under Selznick's wing; Jennifer Jones and Shirley Temple, and a lot of recently signed lesser-knowns. She acts as talent scout, and takes on special picture exploitation assignments. At present, it's Mr. S.'s new show, "Since You Went Away."

Not all women can be in pictures, of course. But Anita's ideas go just as well in the main for a gal in an office, or a housewife.

Her strongest cry is for the simple, basic, well-cut dress which can be changed by accessories.

"Get a good black or brown dress," Anita says, "with a boat neck, perhaps, or a neck that is cut square. Both are very good now. And, with that as a background, you will have five or six costumes in one. You can wear the dress with clips and a mad little hat for formal occasions. Or, you can put on a gilet or a collar, get a white pique curvette, and wear white gloves to the office. Or, you can stick flowers at the belt and wear a snood with flowers on the band. Or—well, you can do almost exactly what your fancy dictates and get away with it.

"I have told my girls at Vanguard never to appear on the lot without a hat, stockings, and gloves. Even in Hollywood, where dress is casual to the point of sloppiness, these are important musts. And, particularly in a business where appearance is half the battle, they are imperative.

"Any business girl would do well to follow the hat, gloves, stockings rule, too. Gloves are cheap nowadays. Stockings, while not nylon or silk, are at least better than they were a couple years ago. And with the new styles in hats—curvettes, bandeaux and snoods—there is no reason why every girl should not have as many as she wants.

"She can make her hats herself.

G-G ARTCRAFT,
153 West 72nd St., New York 23, N. Y.

For instance, she can do as I did: Get some velvet ribbon and some flowers which are striking and good as to color, sew the blossoms on the ribbon at the point which is most becoming to her, and tie the ribbon under her back hair. This, believe it or not, makes a hat. A very good hat for 1944, and a very cheap one.

"Or, she can take the crown of an old felt hat and sew flowers or layers of tulle or eyelet on it, and wear it either on the back of her head or in the new straight-on fashion. Or, she can have a half-hat by cutting the brim off an old straw hat, steaming it into a bonnet shape over a tea-kettle, binding the back with velvet ribbon, hanging a few flowers on one side so that they brush her face—and presto! There it is.

"I am very partial to flowers, if they are not worn in the same old ways. A big bunch of violets is lovely, for example, just under a girl's chin. They are good tucked into the belt of a suit or a simple dress. They are fine on hats, near the face. And I'm very partial to new uses for jewelry. For instance, I put a series of small bumblebee pins on the sleeve of a suit instead of the lapel. I twist a long gold chain over my shoulder and under one arm and fasten it with gold pins like a guardsman's decoration, instead of using it across my chest.

"The answer to all this is that I try new ideas—and I make the girls I work with try them. I put on an old hat straight instead of on one side, and thereby give it a modern look. I sit in front of a mirror and figure out different hairdos, such as braiding my hair in two pigtails with colored ribbons of two shades to match the colors on a playdress. I experiment with new combinations of color."

Anita has, of course, worked with expensive, high-style clothes for years. But how can a gal on a small budget follow fashion trends without losing her financial shirt?

"Read the good fashion magazines," she advises. And watch the things they advocate. But don't buy something simply because they mention it once. Remember that the stylesetters are feeling their way, many times. They are waiting to see whether or not a new idea catches on. So, you wait, too. If the same thing is plugged twice—like the short coat, for example—then you can be reasonably sure it will be good. Then, and only then, you can buy it—or a copy of it.

"When you buy copies, buy good ones. And always keep in mind that the simplest clothes are the most easy to copy—as well as being the best from a fashion standpoint.

"The reason for dressing badly is, I think, that many girls are too lazy to think up the little things which will make them outstanding. Instead, they try to copy someone, and usually pick the wrong person. They try to be like Rita Hayworth when they look nothing like her, instead of dressing as themselves and creating a coherent whole.

"This doesn't take a lot of money. With the basic dress or suit that I spoke of, and good accessories, any girl can look really well. Accessories are the answer, as far as I'm concerned. Without them, a woman is comparable to a house that is only half-furnished. With them, the house has bric-a-brac around and looks charming and inviting."

DEANNA DURBIN

cameras, and spending the other half in a studio school room.

While other girls were deep in the problem titled, "Why doesn't Bob ask me to go skating—and why does Homer pester me to death?" Deanna was busily studying a radio script and taking vocal lessons.

She wasn't allowed even the normal vainglories and fading of puppy love; because of her very prominence, her first love interest matured into marriage. Now, with that phase well over, she it catching up on the lighthearted dancing and romancing that other girls enjoy at sixteen, seventeen, and twenty-forever.

Another girl might well manage such a "return to her teens" without comment from the world at large—but Deanna is public property, which makes for complications.

Recently, when closing a broadcast, she said softly into the mike, "Goodnight, Dickie boy." The following day a Hollywood gossip columnist quickly, and without research, announced that this "Dickie boy" might well be Dick Powell. That was an unfortunate suggestion—because Dick Powell and Joan Blondell, as moviegoers all know, had just separated.

The "Dickie" of Deanna's fond greeting was actually her three-year-old nephew, Richard Heckman, who had been allowed to remain up late to hear Aunty May Pole, as he calls her, sing.

Such absurdities are bound to vex Deanna in quest of her youth. Whenever she appears in a supper club with such a close friend as Felix Jackson, her longtime producer, someone is going to hear the rustle of Cupid's arrows, no matter how businesslike the conversation may be. The truth is, Deanna has lunched with Mr. Jackson every one of her working days since she began as a little eager girl at Universal. Such long acquaintanceship is anything but romantic—but try to pursuade the eager columnists of that fact!

When she has a new leading man, such as Dean Harens in "Christmas Holiday," eager-beaver journalists will undoubtedly sniff the air for the scent of orange blossoms.

But don't believe a word you hear—until Deanna, herself, makes the announcement.

At present, Deanna is living alone, except for her housekeeper, in her own home. She likes it that way. She feels no sense of isolation—nor aloneness. After her crowded days, the aloneness is a beautiful relief.

The Durbin house—contrary to popular conception—is no massive affair, jutting a dozen ridgepoles into the California sunshine. It is a single-story cottage, the room plan of which consists of a den, kitchen and housekeeper's quarters, a living room, dining room, playroom, and two bedroom suites. Deanna occupies one of these, and Anne Shirley occupies the other, when she spends an occasional night with Deanna.

These duet house parties usually occur on Tuesday night. After completing the day's work at the studio, the two girls meet at the Durbin house, have dinner, then rush to the Hollywood Canteen where they sign autographs or carry on service conversations when time permits.

Afterward they stop at an eatery and destroy a chicken sandwich and a cup of chocolate, while comparing notes on the evening.

There is, naturally, an unalterable Canteen rule which forbids any Canteen worker from dating any service man. If it should be proved that even a telephone number had been bestowed upon a petitioning G. I., the luckless girl could never return to the Canteen. However, our Army works on the theory that a guy was never ruled off for trying.

In general, the suppliants are of two types: the first is the sincere, courteous, genteel sort who would be an eligible escort if Deanna met him under non-war circumstances. Such a chap usually begins by apologizing: "I hope you won't think I'm fresh or presumptuous, but it would certainly make me happy if you would do me the honor of letting me take you to dinner some night."

When such a khaki is reminded of the rules, he usually says, "I completely forgot. Please forgive me. I only asked because I have admired you for so long that I feel as if I know you."

The hepcat type, junior Casanova division, usually gives out with the old personality smile, leans over confidentially and intones, "Say, how's chances of me taking you to the Palladium when this is over, Toots?"

One evening recently, Deanna was handed a fountain pen by a boy who wanted an autograph. After she had signed his book, she continued to use the pen for several additional signatures. Then, in the confusion and noise and jostling crowd, Deanna lost sight of the patient pen-owner. She continued to chat and sign.

With amusement she noted that she was using a pencil, then a pen, then a pencil. Ordinarily the boys hand her the first writing instrument they can command.

Finally the original G. I. pen-loaner came back and said apologetically, "I hate to trouble you, Miss Durbin, but are you through with my pen yet? I wouldn't bother you, but I have to go now."

Deanna swallowed hard. "Didn't I return your pen to you?" she asked in a small voice.

He shook his head.

And here, all ye panting swains, is the twist on the Canteen rules: Deanna secured the fellow's name and address, meanwhile thanking her lucky stars that she happened to have a beautiful, unused, neatly-boxed fountain pen at home. This was soon shipped to the G. I., who is now a regular correspondent.

Another of Deanna's merry contacts with the Armed Forces resulted in a letter from a boy stationed in Australia. He had visited the Canteen just before he had been shipped out; since that time he had avidly read the public press and had come to the conclusion that, due to gas rationing, meat rationing, canned food rationing, monumental income taxes, the absence of butter, bobby pins, girdles and eyebrow tweezers, the home front situation was grave.

So he sent Deanna several sticks of gum, saying that his morale had been galvanized by his visit to Hollywood and that he hoped to repay the favor by the chewing supplies which he understood were unobtainable by civilians.

Aside from her G. I. mail, which is large, Deanna gets a great many letters from puzzled girls who want to know how to develop what they describe as the Durbin Sophistication. One unhappy alice complained, "You always say the right things at precisely the right time. How do you manage to stay in the groove?"

Deanna answered with frank amusement that being glib on the screen is comparable to getting married by proxy: someone else does all the work. Tossing off mots exceedingly bon—with a script writer whispering in one's ear—is wonderful work during the day, but Deanna has normal tongue trouble when cast on her own devices on a date that night.

The first time she was awe stricken into a reasonably exact facsimile of an exclamation point with wooden feet occurred when she was working on "Hundred Men And a Girl"—the hundred men being minor, but their leader, Stokowski, being major enough to render even hardened music critics inarticulate.

In such a situation, the inclination of most teensters is to babble. Mr. Stokowski was extremely quiet, an attitude that would ordinarily have spurred a nervous performer into Flying Cardoza feats of conversation. Deanna, however, stifled the impulse. She decided that it would be much more restful to say nothing; she sensed that Stokowski's silence was friendly, so she relaxed. That worked out so well that Deanna's continued use of vast acres of stillness has earned for her the admiring title, "Little Poker Pan."

But just because a girl has met her share of toppists in all lines and has managed to non-goof it conversationally, don't think that her personal and private ad libbing is going to be any easier.

Not so long ago Deanna double-dated with one of her best girl friends. Friend is brighter than Lake Mead at noon in July; she sparkles and scintillates and peels off cracks at 160 r.p.m. At first Deanna cooked up an occasional quip, but after a bit her face began to get tired. So she shushed. She decided that being an appreciative audience was her best role, so she settled back to enjoy herself.

The pay-off in a spot of this kind is that sooner or later one meets a man who is, himself, no novice Noel Coward, and who appreciates a girl forty decibels quieter than homecoming at a girls school.

About these and other troubles, Deanna and Anne Shirley frequently confer. They agree on practically every subject, including that most delicate one: the selection of a hobby. They are both quite drooly over ballet. For Christmas two years ago Deanna gave Anne a pair of pink satin ballet slippers. Not that Anne was planning to enter a life of glissade arabesques, but simply because it seemed like such a good idea. This year she gave Anne a blue chiffon nightie, a book of recordings of the songs from "The Student Prince" . . . AND a ballet dancer figurine for the Shirley lapel.

Deanna studied ballet for five years and hopes one day to do a picture about the life of a première danseuse. When she was small, she and her mother got into one of those domestic conflicts that marks the development of every child. Mrs. Durbin told her young daughter that she had to do certain things or there would be war in camp.

Miss Durbin faced her parent sternly. "All right for you," she said in sepulchral tones. "I'm going to run away and be a ballet dancer!"

To date, this ambition has been realized only to the extent of Deanna's buying tickets to every ballet performance given in Los Angeles, and having the walls of her studio dressing room decorated with Degas prints.

Anne and Deanna share another characteristic: They are as sentimental as sound good sense allows. Shortly after the holidays last year, a mutual friend was discussing the fine blaze to be had in one's fireplace by courtesy of the late lamented Christmas tree. The girls exchanged dismayed glances at such sacrilege. When any festivity is over, Deanna likes to have all the trappings and glitter removed as quickly and as unobtrusively as possible. The tree, she thinks, should be quietly handed over to the mercies of the junkman; to burn it would be to destroy a symbol of a season.

Incidentally, one of Deanna's most treasured gifts last year was a twenty-five volume set of the works of Rudyard Kipling, the initial volume of which set was long ago autographed by the mustached British firebrand. The first book Deanna read was "The Light That Failed." That completed, she scanned "The Jungle Books" and is currently reading a bit about Mogli to her nephew, Dickie, each time that enthralled young gentleman is her guest.

Dickie received such an array of wooden victory toys for Christmas that his imagination completely broke down under the strain. With great eyes he viewed his scooter, his target game, his army jeeps, trucks, and tanks, and his bright red wagon.

Then he gave up and devoted himself to playing with the lovely boxes in which Aunty May Pole's presents had come. These, he found, could be worn on the head, or could be shoved along as a train. One could sit in them, or one could stow away filched treasures in them. "Boxes are the nicest present," he confided to an inquiring aunty.

And so, between her niece and nephew, her reading, her canteen work, palship with Anne, and her ever-demanding picture work, Deanna is obviously a very busy girl. She's working now in "Can't Help Singing."

In spite of such a schedule she will have time to have dates with Henry Wilson, Bob Stack (when he is in town), Dean Harens (her leading man in "Christmas Holiday") and with a good many other highly interesting men. You will see frequent mention of these dates in your favorite magazine, but don't take it seriously.

Deanna is just catching up with her teens.

"For my elephants," said "Sabu." "I worry if that new guy is treating them right. I know they're unhappy. I'll bet they miss me. If they could just write a letter so I'd know how they are."

After a while Bob went back to his bunk. He was awake a long time.

Visiting hours for Boots are Sunday afternoons, from one until four. We had planned it was best for me not to go down. After all, Basic Training only lasted eight weeks, and Bob would be busy and preoccupied.

"Think of the wives who haven't seen their husbands for years while they're overseas," we said. "We have to get used to things like this."

"This is war and we must make adjustments," we added. "Think of the wives who live too far away to go visiting for three hours."

Oh, we were very noble! We were extremely sensible and wise and keep the chin up, old girl. It won't seem long when it's over, old boy.

Then, just before the fourth week-end, I got a letter from Bob: "I think it might be a good idea if you came down this week-end," he remarked in his casual fashion.

So I got me a new hat—for certainly there couldn't be a better reason for getting one—and hied myself downtown on Sunday morning. It was a slightly bedraggled but undaunted Jessica who alit from the bus what seemed like days later. (Actually only about four and a half hours.)

"I'd like to see Private Robert Ryan," I said to the Marine in the Reception Building. I felt funny, using the "Private" for the first time.

Finally Bob appeared.

He had a thing folded under his arm with a lot of mottled green markings on it. "A poncho," he advised in superior tones. "A camouflaged poncho. I brought it from the hut in case the deck is damp and we can't get near a bulkhead," I was informed to my complete confusion.

So we went outside and sat on the poncho, on the grass. I learned about running obstacle courses, and the best way to stab a Jap with a bayonet, and the Articles of War.

"But the thing I really like," Bob exclaimed, "is the drilling!"

"Are you kidding?" I muttered, having heard from many sources that drilling is definitely something to stay away from if possible.

"No, it's fun! Marching in time, taking directions. . . . I'm used to that." He seemed sincere. "I'm the tallest man in the platoon so I set the pace."

"Does that mean you're in front?" I asked, as an idea began glimmering in my brain.

"Yes. With two other guys."

"Robert," I said, "you're an awful ham! Dramatically leading your company round and round the parade ground."

"With the help of the D.I.," he glowered at me.

"Who's the D.I.?" I asked.

"The Drill Instructor, of course." Then he looked sheepish. "I guess it does sort of please the ham in me, at that."

I learned all about the proper way to make a bed, the correct system of washing clothes, how to iron, the expert way to shine shoes, the professional way to lengthen the hems of trousers and sew buttons on shirts.

"I sew better than anyone in our platoon," Bob expanded.

"Is that good?" By this time I was feeling quite weak.

"You're darn right it's good!" he answered. Only he didn't say darn, thus saving himself a bad pun.

The high point of Marine Basic Training is record day at the rifle range, where they spend three weeks.

"I made Sharpshooter!" Bob was yelling to me over the telephone, three weeks after my excursion to San Diego. I gathered from the tone of his voice that Sharpshooter was a fine thing. "And now we're off to the P.X. There's a big evening ahead!"

"Can you have a big evening at the P.X.?" I asked.

"It'll be a night of debauchery on candy and coca cola. It's a tradition of the Marine Corps. And that's really an orgy, believe me!"

But there was tragedy ahead. Something was amiss. The Post Exchange was closed!

As they wandered back to their huts, the mournful faces of the boys were something impossible to bear. They trudged along in heavy silence. The day was spoiled. Suddenly an idea struck Bob. He made a dive for the Recreation Hall, and a leap into the telephone booth.

"I'd like to speak to Pat O'Brien," Bob said.

An hour later the grinning Irish mug of Pat was hidden behind an enormous stack of packages, as he stood in the doorway of the hut. He had boxes of candy, boxes of cigars, cigarettes, ice cream, coca cola, gum.

The next day they returned to the Base. Their Boot Camp days were nearly over. But they ended on a high note, thanks to Pat O'Brien. That day Bob wrote me in a letter:

"When we were out at the range, we'd start out early in the morning. It was dark when we left our huts, and we'd march five miles out to the firing range, over the rolling hills. Gradually it would grow light. The air was something out of this world. There's been a lot of rain and the hills are green. The sun would begin to rise behind the low clouds. We'd march along in perfect rhythm, feeling strong and alive in body and soul. In eight short weeks we have become friends for the rest of our lives. I'll miss those friends when we get sent off in a hundred different directions in the next days. But there's something that ties us all together and connects us with all the other men in the Service. I think it's, well . . . comradeship. It's a feeling of connection with other human beings. I wish the whole world had it. Perhaps the war will help."

IT COMES UP MARRIAGE

expensive) until she could find something more within her means in the overcrowded town bothered with a bad housing situation. Finally she got an apartment at Peyton Hall (owned by Claudette Colbert), which place she immediately filled with flowers and her paintings (a new hobby she recently took up), and continued with her film work.

Jess, on the other hand, as Hollywood's number one bachelor, roamed the town with the most eligible girls. If you are a sleuth, however, you can see that the girls he took out after last November were girls already spoken for or on the verge. Here is a list to prove and show you what we mean: Marguerite Chapman, who has a beau in the Army, but not stationed here; Anne Shirley, who is carrying the torch for an unnamed gentleman; Olivia de Havilland, who has received publicity about her heart's belonging to Major John Huston. The others Jess has been pictured with are career conscious girls who do not plan to marry for years! Gloria de Haven, Bonita Granville and Nina Foch, young Columbia actress to whom Jess is "almost a brother." These girls are seen constantly with other young men —which makes it obvious that they are looking for a good dancing partner, not a life attachment.

Susan and Jess, although actually attracted to one another, were afraid to commit themselves. Theirs was a hectic courtship with many misunderstandings and separations. Yet each seemed not to form any other lasting attachments. Words were never spoken, but each knew it was inevitable.

Susan, who was referred to by one columnist as the "Girl who ran one figure into four," went out on bond tours whenever she was between pictures. Jess saw her off on one such assignment, late last March.

Her tour headquartered in Chicago, and when she finished she went to Charleston, Mississippi, to visit for a week. There with her relatives she gave herself time to examine her true feelings for Mr. Barker.

During the course of said trip, though, she met Robert Lowery, also under contract to Paramount, and when she returned to Hollywood had a few dancing dates with him. When the columnists started to ring her phone about a reported romance between the two she answered honestly, "He's just a wonderful dancing partner."

Jess was piqued, of course, but soon Susan was meeting him again and having dinner in the little out of the way places they loved. Mr. Lowery went on to other fields and Susan and Jess were together again. Susan, still protesting against becoming "too serious," as she didn't want to marry; Jess dating Susan, but continuing to take out other girls. But those girls were always the "attached" kind, and Jess frankly admitted to friends that he was Susan's whenever she said the word.

Susan went out on another bond tour in late May and columns reported then that, "Jess Barker stays home nights (that's news) to receive phone calls from Susan Hayward." She returned and Jess proposed for the first time. Susan asked for time to make up her mind. She departed on another camp tour before she gave her answer. Another column reported, "The romance of Susan Hayward and Jess Barker is as cold as a head waiter's nod," and it was true. Susan had picked her way of saying no. Jess complained to no one but carried his torch.

When Susan returned she and Josi Elliot went to Palm Springs for a week and Jess journeyed down to see them. Again he plied his suit, but gently, and nothing seemed settled. At that time Jon Whitcomb came to Hollywood on leave and called down there asking to see her. Susan said she was sorry, that she would see him next time he came. Jess took heart.

Jess proposed and was accepted, and they planned to elope. Then they had a bad misunderstanding and everything was off for a few weeks.

Jess confined his social activities to his Friday nights at the Canteen and Susan withdrew from circulation.

Then they met one day on the street in Beverly Hills and Jess persuaded Susan to let him buy her tea at Romanoff's. This resulted in dinner, and finally, driving home through the tree-lined streets of Beverly Hills, they drew up under one of the famous palm trees and talked out the situation. Neither to this day will say what Jess said when he proposed, but Susan said she would really think it over.

Both went home that night and read a book. The next morning Jess called Susan and said, "I read a book last night and one sentence seemed just the one for me. It said, 'A man must say what is in his heart,' so I'm saying it again." Susan's heart jumped, for quite by coincidence she too had read a book and there was a sentence there that told her what her answer must be. She will not tell what the words were, but oddly enough they were both reading the same book!

Which brings us again to that flower banked altar with the two famous people standing before it. When the brief ceremony was finished and the few close friends had filed out, Susan and Jess stood for a minute alone in the church before they came out into the fading summer sunset.

A small reception for their friends, a short honeymoon within A gas coupon range, and the newlyweds are now settled in Susan's apartment. They're looking for a small house in the San Fernando Valley, a small maid to take care of their needs, and a bit of time to be alone together before they both resume their careers.

SINCE YOU WENT AWAY
WILDER

YES, TWO GREAT BOOKS—both among the year's biggest, most sensational movie hits—NOW BOTH YOURS FREE, as a Double-Gift!

You get Since You Went Away, a story so rich and true that you will carry it in your heart always . . . and so great that it took millions of dollars, seven famous stars, and a Hollywood cast of 5,000 people to bring it to the screen! This is the story Mr. Selznick waited five years to find, to match his smash-hit triumphs with Rebecca and Gone With The Wind!

And, ALSO FREE, you get Jane Eyre, the most banned book of its time, now the thrilling Orson Welles-Joan Fontaine screen triumph! Accept these two books FREE now!

Jennifer Jones, Robert Walker in Selznick International's MOTION PICTURE, "Since You Went Away"

Orson Welles, Joan Fontaine in 20th Century-Fox MOTION PICTURE "Jane Eyre"

Since You Went Away and JANE EYRE

Her Husband Was a Thousand Miles Away . . . but the Handsome Lieutenant Was Not!

SINCE YOU WENT AWAY is the throbbing, heart-warming story of a real American family's gallant fight in the Battle of the Home Front. Their enemies are fear, doubt—and the terrible emptiness which filled their house and hearts the day the father left for an Army camp a thousand miles away! Their ONE friend is—a too handsome Army officer!

When Tony, the father's best friend, was transferred to the home town flying field he moved in with the family. It was hard to say WHO was most delighted—Tony himself; Jan, the daughter; or Anne, the attractive mother

But was not their old colored cook wiser in the ways of the human heart than all of them? "It ain't fitten for Mr. Willet to stay heah," she protested uneasily to Anne, "he's too near yo' age."

No Landlady Would Accept Him!

Still, Tony had to live somewhere. And no "self-respecting" landlady in town would rent him a room—because he insisted on bringing with him his daring life-size painting of a nude!

How would you feel if you were Anne? Naturally your feelings toward your beloved husband could never change. But perhaps your feeling toward his handsome best friend COULD!

Or suppose you were the lovely young Jan? When such an eligible bachelor neglected you and gave his attentions to your own mother—would you forgive and trust her? Or would you silently accuse her?

WHAT Was Her Husband Squandering His Money On?

In either case, it wouldn't help matters if you suspected that Tim was squandering his army pay in Florida—while back at home you were having such a horribly hard time making ends meet! Will Anne ever be able to look her daughters in the face again if she gives in to these seemingly traitorous impulses? Still, isn't there a danger of needlessly offending Tim's best friend by conducting herself too "priggishly"?

Thousands bought and read this great book at $2.50. Millions are now flocking to see the lavish smash-hit movie version! It is YOUR story—and now here is YOUR chance to get and read it FREE!

Cosmetic Close-Ups

THERE'S no closed season for perspiration control. Like every other phase of femininity, it's a year round daily duty.

Whether or not you are as aware of it, the presence of perspiration can be more of a problem in winter than it is in summer. That's because activity and excitement are apt to increase in the busier, colder season. Not only that, contrasting temperatures step up glandular reaction. So, going from a very cold outdoor atmosphere to a very warm steam-heated room may cause underarm perspiration in excess of the slight all-over stickiness you feel on a summer day.

Every season, a daily daintiness program begins with a thorough soap and water cleansing.

However, to maintain this sweet-scented freshness, one more thing is needed—an efficient underarm deodorant or anti-perspirant. Without one or the other, you can expect that, within ten or fifteen minutes after your bath, some hint of underarm odor may occur. Only the prevention of such odor can preserve your charm.

There are two courses open for control. You can permit perspiration and prevent odor by using a deodorant to absorb or neutralize it. Deodorants are available in cream, liquid or powder form. They can be used any time, anywhere. They should be used at least once a day.

You can check the perspiration itself with an anti-perspirant, either a cream or a liquid. If you prefer to keep underarms dry, you can be sure that the moisture will seep out through some other section of skin where it can dry readily without offensive odor. Three or four applications of anti-perspirant a week should be sufficient for perfect peace of mind.

Just be sure, though, when you choose your favorite "check-mate" that you know which kind of control you are getting. And be sure to use it according to directions. Then, day in and day out, you and your self-confidence will be secure.

The greatest star of the screen!

In Collier's, Good Housekeeping, McCall's, Woman's Home Companion, American Magazine and Cosmopolitan, the Picture of the Month is "An American Romance".

★ ★ ★ ★

The Picture Company of The Year is—but why say it.

★ ★ ★ ★

Getting downright serious, M-G-M has put a lot of laurel on this leonine mane in this Anniversary Year of 1944.

★ ★ ★ ★

King Vidor directed "An American Romance". One of the first pictures made by the company was his "The Big Parade". That was in 1924.

★ ★ ★ ★

"An American Romance" is a Big Parade of our time, our country, our struggles, our loves. It is a "must" picture and is to be ranked along with those other recent "musts" "The White Cliffs of Dover", "Dragon Seed" and "The Seventh Cross".

★ ★ ★ ★

We're not going to expand further about the glorious and forthcoming "Mrs. Parkington" which stars Greer Garson and Walter Pidgeon. We're going to leave this expansion to kismet.

★ ★ ★ ★

Did you know that kismet means fate in Arabic? Well you will when you see the dazzling romance, the swirling orgy of panoramic color that stars Ronald Colman.

★ ★ ★ ★

"Kismet" is about the biggest eyeful that has ever happened on the screen.

★ ★ ★ ★

Marlene Dietrich who dances her way to romance is clothed in Technicolor.

★ ★ ★ ★

James Craig is in it, Edward Arnold is in it, Hugh Herbert, Joy Ann Page, Florence Bates, Harry Davenport and thousands of others are in it.

By FREDDA DUDLEY

[illegible]

Philip Dorn, made up for his part in "Petrified Forest", entered the Commissary and seated himself in an inconspicuous corner. He was a gruesome sight with a simulated black eye and numerous makeup department cuts, bruises and contusions. A friend, not realizing that the picture had started, rushed up in consternation and demanded, "What on earth happened to you?"

"Just ran into a band leader," said Phil.

Bride of the month was lovely Tamara Toumanova, former star of the Ballet Russe and more recently the star of RKO's "Days Of Glory" and "Little Green Hussar."

In New York, over two years ago, the dark-eyed dancer (who is known to her friends as Too-Too) was introduced to tall, brilliant Casey Robinson, writer-director for RKO.

Mr. Robinson had been a practical bachelor for several years, but it was a lonely life — particularly at holidays. When he heard the vivid Russian girl describing the festivities of the Russian Christmas celebration, he mentioned that one day he would like to share in the Muscovite merriment.

Eventually Miss Toumanova accompanied him through a far more solemn rite: the hour-long Russian marriage service during which a golden crown is supported above the heads of the bride and groom by their attendants. Too-Too wore an original Sophie wedding gown of white taffeta distinguished by a train five yards long.

Mr. Robinson, in accordance with Russian custom, met his bride at the door of the church and there presented her with a cascaded bouquet of white orchids. His wedding gift to her was a diamond bracelet.

Among their other wedding gifts were two icons of silver and crystal, given by the bride's parents. Considered also as a present was the appearance at the wedding of George Balanchine, celebrated choreographer who has known Miss Toumanova since she was a dancing sprite of eleven, living in Paris. "I have come to see my daughter married," he said, although he is less than a decade her senior.

After the ceremony the Robinsons drove to sunny Santa Barbara to spend their honeymoon.

[illegible] BOOGIE

Other lake-front inhabitants watched this character every Sunday. He certainly had a passion for paint. First he painted the small landing at the foot of his pier; then he painted the hull of a dory; then he swam out to an anchored float and set to work on it. His method of transporting a can of paint and his brushes was exciting: he swam first on his back, then on his side, hauling himself along with one arm while the other held his equipment high and dry. The color he chose was bright blue, and the name he painted on the bow of the boat was "Nancy II."

All true devotees of The Voice will, at this point, utter a shrill outcry of recognition. The ardent aquatic Van Gogh was Frank Sinatra, fixing up his Toluca Lake property.

Two parts of an inseparable trio. Evie and Keenan Wynn were in Van Johnson's car the night of his near-fatal accident, which was the start of this wonderful friendship. "You saved my life, pal," Van told Keenan—which was true, you know—and they've been best pals ever since.

SKY EYES

When, several weeks ago, Howard Hughes took off in the Constellation and headed for New York, Julie Bishop had her eyes on the sky until the big ship had vanished. Then she haunted the radio until the Constellation glided smoothly down the runway at La Guardia.

When news of the invasion reached Hollywood Julie spent another vigil between radio, telephone and post box, waiting for news.

Reason for her anxiety was the fact that, in the first instance, Lt. Colonel Clarence Shoop of the Army Air Corps rode with Hughes in the Constellation crew. And as commanding officer of a reconnaissance group he took the first aerial photographs of the invasion.

When Julie learned that Colonel Shoop was to be on the east coast for a personal report to headquarters she hopped the first plane available and shortly thereafter became Mrs. Shoop. The wedding was solemnized on the lawn at the Falls Church, Virginia, home of Mr. Jack Frye, president of T.W.A. After a honeymoon, Julie returned to Hollywood and her groom went back to his post in England.

SINGLETON

For his wife's birthday, Zachary Scott had ordered a pair of custom-built earrings consisting of a thick gold circlet (like a wedding band) upon which had been tossed a shower of rubies. Traubert & Hoeffer were executing the design, but when the deadline date arrived, only one earring was completed, so Zack wrapped it carefully and presented it with a note reading "This is for your right ear; a left earring is useless because a woman always has to remove it to answer the telephone."

"Paramount's 'TILL WE MEET AGAIN' is a lovely romantic story that is so realistic it could be happening to your soldier boy in France this very minute!"—says MELISSE

Meet Barbara Britton in "Till We Meet Again"

"Well, Paramount does it again! This time they picked a budding young star out of the Pasadena tournament of roses, and blossomed her into a beautiful leading lady . . . Some people have all the luck —but not so quick! Barbara waited over two years for the Big Break.

"This young lady is something to write about . . . Remember the pretty girl in 'So Proudly We Hail' who tries on the big straw hat with the cherries? . . . Well, that's HER!

"She starts out in this picture wearing a nun's robe, from then on wears nothing but a plain blouse and skirt, but still looks like an angel! For hers is a natural sort of beauty . . . soft blond hair, baby blue eyes, with the longest eyelashes —and they're real!

"It's no wonder that in this past year she's been the cover girl on eight issues of the greatest women's magazines!"

"A fascinating picture of what happens when a beautiful young French girl leaves the nunnery and faces earthly temptations and dangers . . . risking her life to save the life of an American soldier by posing as his wife."

WEATHER REPORT: SQUALLS OVER BEVERLY HILLS

First squall was occasioned by the arrival of Juliet Colman, daughter of Ronald Colman and Benita Hume. The young lady's name gives her a titular start in the perennial race of blossoming actresses to die beside Romeo.

Second squall was brought about by the arrival of 7 pound 12 ounce Mr. Christopher Paul Lewis, lusty son of Loretta Young and Lieutenant Colonel Tom Lewis. One of the baby's gifts was an ornate, hand made pink bonnet. Loretta put it away with the explanation that Chris was a trifle too rugged for that type of heddahopper, and that eventually it would be most appropriate for the kid sister which the Lewis family would like to add to the nursery. Most enthralled member of the family, to be found misty-eyed watching the baby sleep, was Judy, Loretta's eight-year-old daughter.

SHORT SNORTER:

Margo, who made such a hit in "Behind The Rising Sun," has just sold a short story to The New Yorker, further proving her versatility.

SPLASH CRASH:

Dorothy Parker once wrote:

> Yes, I loved you Tuesday
> But what is that to me?
> That I don't love you Friday
> Is very plain to see.

This was Esther Williams' theme as she announced her separation, after four years of marriage to Dr. Leonard Kovner. This rift didn't surprise Hollywood, which has long suspected that there might be another person in the swim.

It's rumored that June Allyson will marry Dick Powell when his divorce becomes final. But nothing is certain, till the time comes.

As fan to fan, Jane Wyman turns the tables. She gave a lot of autographs, while in N. Y. for a 10-day visit; here, she requests one!

QUOTABLES FROM NOTABLES:

Alfred Drake, nimble dancing star of "Oklahoma," was brought to Hollywood to star opposite Rita Hayworth in "Chautauqua", the picture Columbia had planned to make as soon as Rita had finished "Tonight And Every Night." Because of Rita's expectations, "Chautauqua" has been indefinitely postponed, of course.

When Mr. Drake appeared on the Old Gold show, someone asked him—before the broadcast began—what was to become of his picture career. "It has laid an egg," he said. "But I'll tell you this: it's the first time that a Drake has been given the bird by a stork!"

Gracie Field, the beloved English comedienne, appeared for her broadcast gowned as simply as usual, but wearing a gorgeous bracelet. In time-conscious Hollywood, the ideal condition is to be extremely young, yet in possession of some priceless antiques. With this in mind, someone said to Gracie, "That lovely bracelet! I presume it's an antique—a family heirloom, perhaps?"

Gracie hooted. "Lor' love me, no! This bracelet is as modern as a neon sign and almost as dazzling."

have been properly stub-toed. One perpetual shoe will be kept by Lana, one by Steve.

Steve carried his thriving daughter during the shopping tour and had a great time with her. When time for leave taking came, Steve said "Tell your Daddy bye-bye, darling," and started to kiss her cheek. That young lady, having observed the habits of grown-up babies, turned her small mouth up and kissed her father's lips. Then she laughed, obviously liking the experience, and kissed him again. "Dada," she crowed, smearing his mouth with dewy kisses.

Steve relinquished his daughter to Lana, managed to observe all the courtesies, then walked quickly away, fumbling in his pocket for a handkerchief to dry swift, inexplicable tears.

GOING WILD AND WOOLLEY

Keenan Wynn arrived at the broadcasting station, preparatory to appearing on the Kraft Music Hall, garbed in—among other civilized essentials—a beard and a pair of fleece-lined flying boots and gloves. A gruesome sight if you ever saw one!

This was not a gag. He wears the padded boots and gloves as part of his motorcycle outfit. He had purchased the boots in Karachi, India, while he was on his U.S.O. camp tour. Those who imagine that buying boots in a country in which there are no ration points must be a childishly simple operation should hear Keenan's story.

In the Indian market place, the boots, unmated, are lined up row after row. The customer moves around, trying on gear, until he finds one boot that fits. Then he tries to locate the mate.

The beard was part of his character makeup for his part in "Seattle," and Keenan solemnly stated that he would like to wear a Van Dyke at all times as it would allow him ten minutes of additional sleep each morning, and it would serve as a priceless conversation starter.

NOW IT CAN BE TOLD DEPARTMENT

Last winter, while George Montgomery was stationed in Alaska with a company making an army training short, word reached camp that a man in an isolated district had been attacked by a bear; his leg was badly lacerated and it was necessary to evacuate him to a hospital with all possible speed. His camp was accessible only by boat; the channel was choked with ice and subject to barrage blizzards, so volunteers were secured for the mission. George, a practical man, decided that he might be of use, so went along.

On the way back the small boat was reefed on top of a huge mid-channel ledge of rock and a hole was knocked in the keel. Luckily a freighter was near enough to lend aid, and the men were picked up. Then it was decided to attempt to salvage the coast guard cutter. George volunteered to work with the crew in an effort to board up the hole and right the boat, which had turned on its side.

Such tasks are the hard, unspectacular, grindingly dangerous jobs of war. In Alaskan waters men have been known to freeze to death in an hour, but George and the men with whom he worked were in and out of the frigid water in shifts all night long. They salvaged the boat, towed it to port, and got their man to the hospital.

One of the crew, who knew that George had just recovered from a siege of pneumonia, awarded the actor the only medal that a man really wants: the respect of a fellow who has shared the same experience. "You sure looked good on that job, George," the man said fervently, using the careful understatement characteristic of fighters. "You sure looked awful good."

LEBENSRAUM

The house in which vivacious Doris Dudley was living in Santa Monica was sold; she and her family, including Butch Jenkins (who became America's favorite freckled friend in 'The Human Comedy') had to move . . . before August 1st.

Eventually they purchased another house, larger and more convenient, but unavailable until the latter part of September. So, during the waiting period, Doris finally found—after weeks and weeks of search—a very cramped one-room beach apartment. In it moved Doris, Skipper (Butch's older brother), Butch, the maid and her small baby, Butch's full-grown St. Bernard, and (whenever he could get a week-end leave) Doris Dudley's husband, Lt. Dick Leahy.

Butch returned one Sunday afternoon from a stroll along the vast, lonely beach upon which breaks the limitless, horizon-stretching ocean, and noted the family coagulated in the single room. "Gosh," sighed Butch, wagging his head, "we sure do live together, don't we?"

John Scott Trotter, celebrated native of North Carolina, suave and cultured gentleman and eminent authority on music, recently bought Louella Parsons' valley farm. "The thing that decided me to buy the place," he confessed, rubbing his exquisite musician's hands together, "was the sight of that wonderful tracto-ah!"

FLOX OF SOX:

She knitted and she purled; she knitted and she purled. This went on for weeks and weeks, months and months. Finally someone couldn't stand the suspense longer and asked Catherine Craig what on earth she was making and whether she ever finished the item.

The answer was no idle yarn: she was, she said, knitting sox for her husband, Lieutenant Robert Preston, now serving in England. The current pair on the needles was No. 16.

Movieland's NEW PICTURE GUIDE

5 BEST PICTURES OF THE MONTH ON PAGE 58

THE DOUGHGIRLS (Warner Bros.) gives the lie to the sometimes-made-claim that stage farces do not always a funny movie make.

This satire on war-crowded Washington gains rather than loses laughs, in being put before the camera. And the cast is nothing but the best: Ann Sheridan, Alexis Smith and Jane Wyman, as the three "wives" who run into such a series of difficulties before qualifying as legally wed; Jack Carson, as the man Jane thought she had married; John Ridgely as the bridegroom with a first wife (Irene Manning) who turned up inopportunely to remind Ann that her being the predecessor was a priority advantage she had no intention of relinquishing; Charles Ruggles, big Washington business executive whose business is mostly with pretty secretaries; and Eve Arden, the little Russian girl with a big gun—that shoots!

And the things that happen—and keep happening—every full second! It's fastly-sent dialogue delivered with amused tongue-in-cheek; it's a Mark Hellinger production, directed by James V. Kern, and altogether simply swell.

MUSIC IN MANHATTAN (RKO) has to do with a marriage arranged via the newspaper story plant of a musical revue publicity agent.

Frankie Foster (Anne Shirley) is the girl, Captain Johnny Pearson (Phillip Terry) is the boy. And as the story goes, they're married before they meet — a complication which gets more and more involved in the clarifying of it, with Frankie's fiance (Dennis Day) not in the least happy about the whole thing.

As a musical, you shouldn't be led to expect too much that's out of the ordinary; but as the vehicle bidding to send Phillip Terry on to bigger and better starring roles, the picture is potentially important.

PRACTICALLY YOURS (Paramount) has a double meaning as the title for the new Fred MacMurray, Claudette Colbert comedy. The practical business is taken all very literally by Gil Lamb, identified as the "accounts receivable" would-be bridegroom of a girl named Peggy (Claudette). And at the same time, what starts everything rolling for this funny situation that makes the plot is having Peggy "practically" (meaning almost) married to a surprised war hero (MacMurray).

Responsible for everything that happens is having the hero say loving things intended for his dog, which he calls Piggy. Piggy is mistaken for Peggy, and the returned flying ace finds himself pledged to please a whole nation of romantic sympathizers by being about to marry someone he hardly knows.

It may sound crazy, and it is. It may sound confusing, and it's that too—most especially to Mr. MacMurray! But what a lot of laughs, and the fun lasts straight through.

SWEET AND LOW-DOWN (20th Century-Fox) is the latest Benny Goodman musical, with Benny and the band boys playing "themselves."

The story excuse for treating us to all this fine King of Swing music has a lot to do with a trombone character named Johnny Birch (James Cardwell), discovered and "built" by Goodman till he gets swell-headed and ambitious about the whole thing. Which is the cue for having him meet Trudy Wilson (Linda Darnell, to you). Always a cocky sort of guy, meeting Trudy is what cinches it for Johnny; he's determined to get to the top, no matter how.

He lures Benny's bandmen away and forms an outfit of his own. But without Benny, the whole thing flops (of course!)—and Johnny's right back in the not-so-good tenements.

The happy ending is assured, however, by the fact that these plots never miss carrying along a Mr. Fix-it, who unravels all the complications and makes everything okay. The character so to be identified in this case is Benny's sidekick, Popsie (Jack Oakie).

So, Johnny gets Trudy, Benny gets Johnny, Popsie gets the prize for being No. 1 peacemaker, and the swing fans get a batch of swell new tunes: "I'm Making Believe," "Ten Days With Baby," "Chug, Chug, Choo-Choo, Chug," and "Hey Bub! Let's Have A Ball."

CASANOVA BROWN (International), with Gary Cooper in the title role, is like nothing you might expect it to be. Fact is, it's a story so full of the "unexpected" that you almost have to see it to appreciate it. For look what happens:

Professor Casanova, teacher of English, is about to wed his hometown sweetheart (Anita Louise), but just hours before the ceremony is to take place, there's a curious message delivered, sending the about-to-be-a-bridegroom off to Chicago to visit a maternity hospital.

In the meantime it's explained that the professor is not new to this thing called love and marriage, but he had assumed that the vows he'd exchanged with a pretty little Barnard college student (Teresa Wright) were made null and void at the request of the girl's parents.

There are more than a few times during the course of the picture when the "who's married to which" question becomes all too much to solve. Cass plunges into the responsibilities of "being a father," confuses everything even further by becoming a formula-mixer, and adds even a third marriage proposal before the merry mix-up is unmixed.

That the whole thing is a farce is very much by intention—by the fine direction of Sam Wood, getting A-1 performances from the principals, and with credit to the fine comedy support of Frank Morgan.

GREENWICH VILLAGE (20th Century-Fox), technicolorful musical avec Don Ameche and Carmen Miranda, introduces a new singing, dancing heroine—red hair, a pretty face, nice figure and voice—named Vivian Blaine.

The story takes place in 1922, which was about the time Greenwich Village was at its best, according to them as waxes sentimental and nostalgic about all this and artists too.

Don Ameche, musical instructor at a midwestern college, comes to New York to sell his piano concerto, stumbles instead into meeting a lot of screwy characters who labor under the delusion that Ameche is a moneybags and promptly set out to take his dough away from him.

Gives it glamour, a new set of the Miranda head-dresses, and Bill Bendix in a Tuxedo. Add Felix Bressart as a broken down violinist, and a fine set of musical numbers.

THE CANTERVILLE GHOST (M-G-M) is no ordinary spook, and the story that tells about his being condemned to roam the castle midnights, waiting for some Canterville of the future to perform an heroic deed, is no ordinary thriller.

Charles Laughton plays the role, romping about in his own medieval way clad in his familiar Henry VIII get-up. But for all that he's a captivating, likable sort of wraith, it takes little Margaret O'Brien, the seven-year-old Lady Jessica Canterville, to lift the film up where it belongs and sustain it as whimsical fantasy.

And fantasy it is—opening with early 17th century scenes which show Sir Simon de Canterville in his "before becoming a ghost" period, and following through to the present when, in the current war, a platoon of American Rangers is billeted in Canterville Castle.

That Robert Young could be a bit more confidence-inspiring as the young Ranger who's to free the weary ghost—yes, perhaps. But that his scenes with little Margaret are completely charming — yes, it's a fact. And with special credit to the story handling department, we say the whole thing comes off being scarily delightful.

MAISIE GOES TO RENO (M-G-M) But not for the usual reason. Trust Maisie (Ann Sothern) to do the unusual and get a man in Reno instead of getting rid of one.

When Maisie is ordered by her doctor to take a much needed vacation from her war work, she's given an opportunity to sing for her supper at one of Reno's swank hotels. In the railroad station she meets a soldier (Tom Drake) who, unable to go to Reno himself, induces Maisie to act as intermediary in helping him win back his wife (Ava Gardner). Miss Gardner, you should know, is a very wealthy young woman whose secretary and business manager are more than a little interested in bringing off the divorce. Arriving in Reno, Maisie sizes up the situation fast, and the rest of the picture deals with her hilarious attempts to expose the connivers for what they are. On the side, she manages to work in a romance with the hotel black jack dealer (handsome John Hodiak) who, convinced that Maisie is just slightly balmy, but loving her nevertheless, brings in the hotel psychiatrist. Maisie is way ahead of them all, though, and finally succeeds in landing the crooks in the clink, the soldier in the arms of his wife, and herself in the arms of Mr. Hodiak. (And that's a nice place to be, too!)

It's slapstick comedy, but Ann Sothern carries the plot along at a rapid pace—which is good.

BARBARY COAST GENT (M-G-M) has Wallace Beery playing "Honest" Plush Brannon, getting into a shooting scrape and having to leave town. In bidding goodbye to his fiancée (Binnie Barnes), he promises to "go straight." But when he discovers a gold mine, sells stock to everyone in town only to have the money stolen from him by one of his erstwhile partners in crime, being honest becomes too very complicated.

To get the money to work his mine, Plush returns to his original trade—which is robbing stage coaches.

Things look pretty bad for awhile, till the gold mine comes through, paying off royally to all the stockholders, and Plush pays his debt to society in the town's new jail, supplied with cigars, beer, and fine food.

All of which makes the film good fare, all the way through—especially for the Beery fans.

A WAVE, A WAC AND A MARINE (Monogram) is strictly hokum, interspersed with corny vaudeville routines. The plot is a comedy of errors in which two understudies for a Broadway production are mistaken for the stars of the show and signed by a film agent. When a rival agent signs the real stars, trouble begins—for the understudies, and for Henry Youngman, the agent who made the mistake.

Elyse Knox, the one bright spot in this picture, distinguishes herself as a beautiful and talented young actress who, with the proper breaks, should go places in Hollywood.

WHEN STRANGERS MARRY (Monogram)—A finely drawn psychological murder story, done in the suspenseful style of Alfred Hitchcock and starring Kim Hunter and Dean Jagger.

A girl from a midwestern town meets and marries a traveling salesman. A few weeks after their marriage, said husband leaves for New York—allegedly "on business."

Wondering what it's all about, and being told nothing, the little wife goes to New York in pursuit, is given a not altogether "glad to see you" reception and has reason to suspect —murder!

Comes then a tour of moving from one dingy rooming house to another, till eventually the pair is discovered by the police. As for what it's all about, and how things turn out—see for yourself. We can't tell 'cause we'd spoil it for you.

GYPSY WILDCAT (Universal) gives us a switch from the regular Westerns, with this Technicolor horse opera laid in the days of drawbridges, moats and robber barons.

Maria Montez, as a foster child of a gypsy chief, not only has colorful gypsy costumes to set off her dark beauty, but is given the opportunity to display her dancing ability to good advantage in a series of gypsy dance numbers.

Jon Hall, as the King's messenger, arrives on the scene just in time to be accused of the murder of a wealthy count. Take it from there, and you have a plot offering romantic escape, colorful melodrama, and roles for Peter Coe, as the gypsy contender for Miss Montez' affections; Leo Carrillo, as the gypsy chief; Gale Sondergaard, as his wife: and Nigel Bruce, as the high sheriff.

SAN FERNANDO VALLEY (Republic) is filled with the popular ballad of the same name and Roy Rogers, cowboy deluxe. Most lavish vehicle Rogers has had so far, it's a musical "cow-medy." Plenty of good-lookin' gals, podner, in Broadwayish production numbers, plus some mean gun-totin' and fightin' and, of course, a chase or two.

Gordon Jenkins' title tune is not plugged to death, understand, but to say that you are familiar with the lyrics and melody when the picture ends is gross understatement.

Dale Evans, Roy's leading lady, sings mighty purty; and that goes, also, for Jean Porter, who plays the man-struck little sister.

Action is centered around a dream ranch, complete with swimming pool. The illusion is complete when "Cyclone" Kenyon (Andrew Tombes), owner of the ranch, hires a bunch of beautiful cow-girls to be his ranch hands!

HEAVENLY DAYS (RKO) makes points that will make plenty of arguments. But novel as the idea is, having Fibber and Molly McGee, with their flair for down-to-earth homely comedy, turning to "things socially significant," they handle the assignment with the greatest of ease.

They're the "home folks" from Wistful Vista, storming Washington Quixote-fashion to level an attack against the red tape formality and bureaucracy of "government." Taking good-natured but not to be mistaken pokes at the theory and practice of isolationism, and reminding Mr. Average Man of his rights 'n responsibilities via the ballot box.

CAN YOU EAT YOUR WAY TO BEAUTY?

Now Anti-Gray Hair Vitamins...

and All Other Beauty Vitamins, too!

Yes, science offers an easy natural way that may help make you more beautiful. It is so simple you will marvel why no one ever thought of it before. It isn't a drug, it isn't a cosmetic. Just improve your diet and to be sure your beauty faults are not caused by a lack of "beauty vitamins" in the food you eat, take healthful PAN-8's. PAN-8's combine the so-called "Anti-Gray Hair" Vitamins and Wheat Germ Oil (E) Vitamins with all other vitamins you may need for real glamour and beauty. You can test PAN-8's VITAMINS yourself at home on the positive guarantee of full satisfaction from a 21-day trial, or your money back.

VITAMINS for Gray Hair Now Reinforced with Vitamins You May Need for a Beautiful Skin, a Beautiful Figure . . . A More Glamorous YOU!

GRAY HAIR

PAN-8's contain not only Calcium Pantathenate (commonly called the "anti-gray hair" vitamin), but Wheat Germ Oil (Staff of Life) E Vitamins as well. Graying, streaked, ageing hair may be caused by a lack of vitamins in your daily diet, and if so, Pan-8's may help keep hair color pigment cells healthy . . . you may soon see gray spread checked and actually see gray hair take back its original natural color at roots, temples and parting. Besides Pan-8's help hair retain its natural sheen and lovely lustre. YOU CAN USE PAN-8's WHETHER YOU NOW DYE YOUR HAIR OR NOT. Soon you may notice you need less and less artificial coloring. And, best of all, your friends won't know you are taking a single thing for your hair! While "anti-gray hair" vitamins are still too new for conclusive evidence remember, Pan-8's is the reinforced "Gray-Hair" Vitamin formula. No matter what you have tried before, mail the coupon for the new Pan-8's on the very fair try-at-our-risk guarantee.

SKIN

Pan-8's contains Vitamin B_2, sometimes called the "beauty vitamin" because it helps clear up sallow skin, muddy complexion and skin disorders, when these skin troubles are caused by a lack of vitamin B_2 in the daily diet.

Pan-8's also contains Vitamin B_1. A lack of B_1 in your daily food can make you feel tired, rundown, older than your years . . . and YOU MAY LOOK JUST AS tired, rundown, weary as you feel. Make up your mind beauty is more than just skin deep. Mail the coupon on the assurance of satisfaction from only a 3 weeks trial, or money back.

Vitamin B_6 is often helpful in promoting clearer, healthier, more youthful looking skin and Pan-8's contains Vitamin B_6. Remember, it often is much easier to correct the diet and get enough skin beauty vitamins daily by taking Pan-8's, than it is to try hopelessly to cover a bad skin appearance (due to vitamin lack) with expensive cosmetics.

SPARKLE and ZIM

How can you look your best when you don't feel your best! If you haven't the sparkle and gleam, if your energy is low and you just haven't the ambition to keep up with your crowd, your complaint may be caused by your meals lacking the vitamins you need for everyday health. That's when Pan-8's may help you the most. Pan-8's contain all the vitamins you may need for better looks from tip (your hair) to toe. Non-fattening. Try Pan-8's 3 weeks. AT COLUMBIA:

A WOMAN'S PRIVILEGE sounds like another Columbia comedy winner. Irene Dunne is the dowdy mayor of a Vermont town, serving in the stead of her deceased husband. During a thunderstorm, her husband's bronze statue in the square is hit by lightning and sundered. Irene goes to New York to commission a sculptor to replace the statue, walks in on sleeping Charles Boyer (the sculptor). He awakens with a start, presumes that she is his new model, and asks her to repair to the next room to remove her garments for posing purposes. Take it from there, Jackson.

AT MGM:

THE ZIEGFELD FOLLIES in Technicolor is nearing completion. This opus has seven more of everything than almost any other picture ever made. The hats alone are like ten years of a Hedda Hopper dream; in the beauty department there is Lucille Ball, Judy Garland, Lena Horne, Marilyn Maxwell, the blonde Wilde twins (Lee will soon be pushing a perambulator) and Esther Williams; in the brawn department we have Astaire, Edward Arnold, Jimmie Craig, John Hodiak, Van Johnson, James Melton and a role enacted by Rooney before he was inducted.

AIRSHIPS SQUADRON is the Metro action opus with Wallace Beery, James Gleason, and Tom Drake.

AT MONOGRAM:

LITTLE DEVILS, a story using Gloria Ann Chew, Fred Mah, Hayward Soo Hoo, Philip Ahn—among others. Headliners are Harry Carey and Paul Kelly. Kelly rates your interest because he is such a swell person. He hasn't missed a Friday night at the Hollywood Canteen for months.

ARMY WIVES, with Elyse Knox, who has just become the army wife of Tommy Harmon.

AT PARAMOUNT:

OUT OF THIS WORLD has Eddie Bracken, Diana Lynn, Veronica Lake, Robert Benchley and Phyllis Brooks cavorting through a picture based on the Sinatra Swoon tradition. Eddie Bracken is the singer, and the glorious gag is that Bing did all the singing, which will be dubbed into shots showing Eddie going through the motions.

AT RKO:

EXPERIMENT PERILOUS is George Brent's first picture since he returned to Hollywood from his work as a civilian Flight Instructor. What makes it such nice work is the presence of Hedy Lamarr as his leading lady.

BETRAYAL FROM THE EAST stars another veteran: Lee Tracy. Nancy Kelly is the lady in the close-ups with Mr. Tracy.

AT REPUBLIC:

BRAZIL is another proof that as long as there are hit songs, Republic will buy the titles, put them on the hoist, and run a six cylinder plot beneath. Virginia Bruce, Tito Guizar, E. E. Horton, Veloz and Yolanda are in this one, so it should be good.

FLAME OF THE BARBARY COAST stars John Wayne and Ann Dvorak; this is Miss Dvorak's first picture since her return from England.

AT 20TH CENTURY-FOX:

NOB HILL is distinguished by Joan Bennett, George Raft, Vivian Blaine, and Peggy Ann Gardner.

CZARINA should be one of the pictures of the year, considering its cast: dynamic Tallulah Bankhead, Charles Coburn (who was so determined to play his role that he almost came to blows with Columbia, in that there was danger that he might not be through with his part in "A Woman's Privilege" in time to fulfill the 20th commitment), William Eythe (who is terrific in wig, epaulettes, skin-tight trou, and cavalry boots), Vincent Price, Mischa Auer, and Sig Ruman.

AT UNITED ARTISTS:

TOMORROW THE WORLD, in which Skippy Homeier terrorizes Fredric March, Betty Field, and Joan Carroll who hasn't made a picture in a long time, but who is maturing into a brilliant actress. (Title temporarily changed to "The Intruder.")

THE GREAT JOHN L is Bing Crosby's first producing effort. Linda Darnell, Greg McClure, Barbara Britton, Wallace Ford, Robert Barrat and Otto Kruger are enthusiastic about the script. It nearly broke Jimmie Craig's heart when he learned that Metro wouldn't loan him to do the title role, now making Greg McClure famous.

HOUSE OF DR. EDWARDES is the current occupation of Ingrid Bergman, Gregory Peck, etc.

AT UNIVERSAL:

CAN'T HELP SINGING is also being shot in Technicolor, and gives Deanna Durbin a role that everyone will like. Robert Paige, Akim Tamiroff, June Vincent and Leonid Kinsky added to please the cash customers.

THE MUMMY'S CURSE has nothing to do with the exclamation of a young mother who discovers at 3 a.m. that all the formula is gone. It does have to do with Lon Chaney's dark doings.

AT WARNERS':

OBJECTIVE BURMA has the distinction of being the only picture in years that, to date, has spent not ONE day on a sound stage. It is one hundred per cent location, and the press is having a rugged time covering it—but they do say that a trip to see Errol Flynn, James Brown, George Tobias, Craig Stevens, William Prince and Johnny Mitchell is worthwhile.

OF HUMAN BONDAGE is the remake of the classic, with Paul Henreid in the Leslie Howard role and Eleanor Parker re-creating the catamount, Millie.

BECAUSE as the boy whose hands were mutilated by Jap torturers in "THE PURPLE HEART," he tore the breath out of audiences all over the country. (That portrayal won him a seven-year contract at 20th Century-Fox and the juvenile lead in "FAMILY ALBUM.") He is not a "pretty boy," and is therefore part of a new trend in screen leading men. His confidence in himself impresses Director Billy Wilder, also Joan Harrison, S.P. Eagle, and other Hollywood moguls. . . . He was tested by MGM in a scene from "HIS GIRL FRIDAY" and made such a sensation that a big producer rushed to sign him to a personal contract, that contract now split with Fox. . . . He is 6′ 1″, blondish, blue-eyed, and has a gaiety about him which attracts both men and women. He is 26, 4-F because of a back injury at school, and likes symphonic music. In stock on the East Coast he played such diversified roles as Tom in "OUTWARD BOUND," Private Dean in "BURY THE DEAD," Danny in "NIGHT MUST FALL," and Marchbanks in "CANDIDA"—and therefore has ample experience for motion picture assignments. His talent was not recognized at first by Hollywood but he was realistic enough to take a job as doorman in a nightclub while scouting for parts by day. His on-screen and off-screen idol is Ingrid Bergman and he prefers Crosby to Sinatra. He spends his Sundays, even when working, entertaining men in army camps . . . We feel he'll hit the jackpot!

STARDOM

BECAUSE she is one of Hollywood's latest and most promising Cinderellas. . . . Her first role on any screen was the lead opposite Errol Flynn in "UNCERTAIN GLORY." She acquitted herself well enough in this film to be cast importantly in "STRANGERS IN OUR MIDST," a remake of the Broadway play, "PETRIFIED FOREST." . . . She has just celebrated her twenty-first birthday and is gloating in the fact that she is now of age. . . . She is the daughter of a retired colonel in the Field Artillery. Her only dramatic experience was in a little theatre at the University of California at Los Angeles, where she starred in "OUR TOWN," did the dumb girl in "LILIOM," and was seen by a Warner talent scout in the costume comedy, "ENGAGED." . . . She was casual about Warners' test offer . . . but they signed her so fast after her first scene, that she is still a little dizzy. . . . She was scared to death her initial day on a sound stage, and is still nervous—though now she loves acting and pictures, enough to want to beat her brains out in her profession. She studies ballet, Spanish dancing, horseback riding and French literature, besides drama; and is learning her craft from scenes with Paul Lukas and Philip Dorn, who are her special tutors. . . . She has brown hair, wide-set green eyes, and a smile that lights up all North Hollywood. . . . We think, of all the Cinderellas we've seen, that she has the best chance of success.

Before LONESOME! Now ENGAGED!

"I blushed when I met people," says Alice Ruth Major of Lowell, Mass. "I weighed 139; had wide hips, thick thighs, oily skin, dry hair and stooped shoulders."

Eyes WIDE AND HANDSOME

By SHIRLEY COOK
BEAUTY EDITOR

Make-up made the difference! And what a difference there is when eyes are properly enhanced by just a few simple steps.

IT'S NOT surprising to know that eye make-up plays an important role in the movies. But Carol Thurston, the wistful Three Martini of Paramount's "The Story of Dr. Wassell," has an interesting two-way theory about an actress' need for such extra eye appeal.

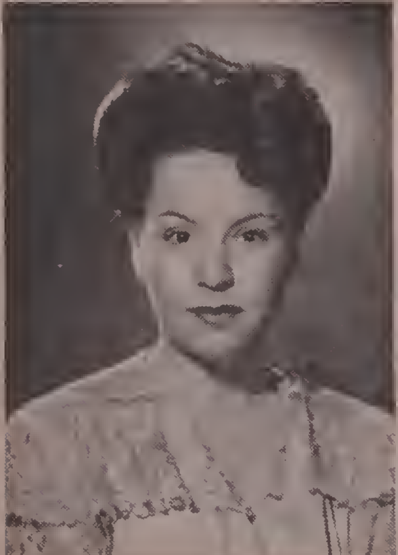
She feels that it's not just for beauty's sake alone (for of course any eyes are much more beautiful when they are accented by shadow, pencil and mascara) but for depth of expression. And that's probably why one of the first things any aspiring actress must learn is the correct use of eye make-up.

Correct doesn't mean complicated. It's simply a question of the right technique and the right restraint.

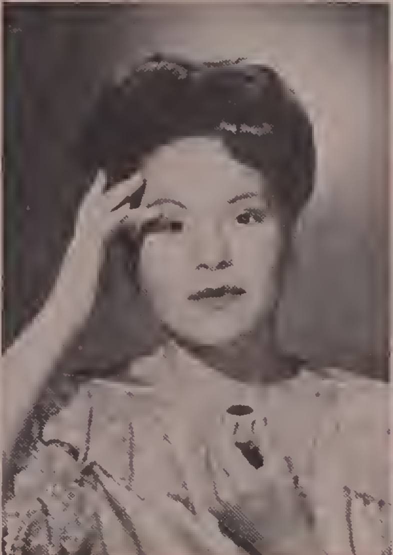
Eye shadow, for instance, must be applied ever so lightly if it is to live up to its name. Yet the merest hint of color on your lids—skillfully blended from the lash line up and out to fade away completely a bit below the brows—will make eyes seem larger and more luminous.

Eyebrow pencil also should be handled with care. The idea is to give the brows more body by building up their natural arc. To avoid a harsh-looking straight line, the pencil is wielded in hair-length strokes and touches the skin only when it is necessary to extend the brows to an ideal quarter-inch beyond the outer corners of the eyes.

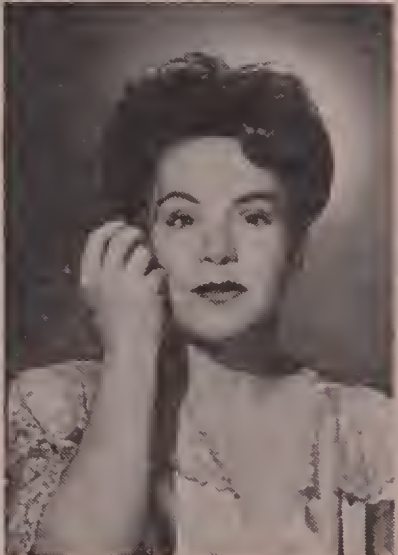
Perhaps the most glamorous eye cosmetic is mascara. You can make the most of it by using a not-too-wet brush and coating the lashes from base to tips. While they are still damp, go over them with another dry brush to remove any surplus. That finished, you will have a frame of flattery around your eyes that stays just where you put it, without re-doing or retouching, until cream or soap and water cleansing time.



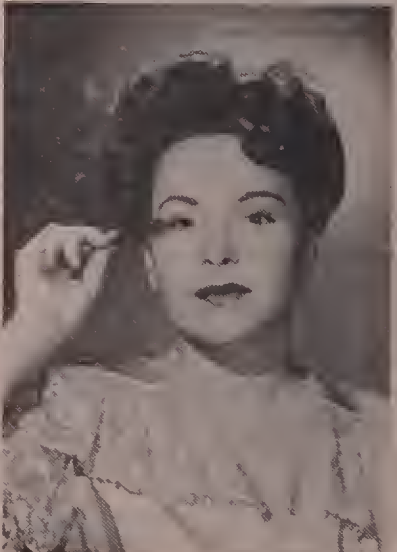
No sparkle here, is there? Even such naturally lovely eyes as Carol's lack much of their appeal when they are minus all make-up



The first form of flattery is a faint touch of shadow lightly touched to lids. Color is faded up and out from lash line toward the brows



Eyebrow emphasis comes next. Pencil applied in short feathery strokes darkens each hair and fills in any sparse spots that spoil the line.



Mascara, swept generously along the entire length of every lash, makes a curly fringe of natural-looking dark, lustrous luxuriance.

Miss Cornelia Otis Skinner

New York

DEAR MISS SKINNER—

Strangely enough, you and I have not seen each other, nor even talked together, since it was decided I was to play the role of you in "Our Hearts Were Young And Gay." In fact, you hadn't even thought of me, much less approved of me to play the part, when we last met. And, oh—how much I wanted that part!

Since then, of course, the picture has been finished. I was hoping for a chance to see you when I was in New York recently. I wanted to thank you—to tell you how much it has meant to me—and to share with you some of the experiences we had in making the picture. For our hearts were "young and gay" then, too—and we had so much fun, Diana Lynn and I, making believe we were you and Emily Kimbrough, and living again all the funny, fantastic and wonderful things that happened to you. What a pair of babies you were! (Says Russell from her hoary old age of 20!)

In one way it is strange that I should have played you, for our backgrounds are as different as night and day. You, of course, were "born" to the theater, what with the famous Otis Skinner for (Continued on page 79)

Confessions of a young actress on being an impersonator, cast to play the role of a living person and fearful that she might not do justice to the assignment

I was ten when this snapshot of Papa and me was taken, in Chicago. A movie-crazy kid, little dreaming that I'd be in pictures one day, myself. One never knows!

My friend Carmelita Lopez and I, on our trip last spring to Arizona. Here we hold down a mule, with our combined weight of 216 pounds. Some of our experiences were far more eventful, really embarrassing!

Remember this? The day we first met. You and Producer Charles Brackett and I, on "The Uninvited" set.

THIS IS Myself

by BETTY HUTTON

Giving her autograph to a G.I. fan at Fort Bragg, N.C. Betty's ambition for after-the-war is to take a world cruise.

I LIKE: Steak—pre-war, thick, perfectly cooked; my new black suit which looks so simple and yet is so striking; Bellodgia perfume; the color blue; those pocket-sized books you can read in an hour; swimming; playing poker with people who enjoy the game but don't get grim about it; bowling; surprises, especially those someone thinks up just to please me.

I HATE: Going to the dentist;
Having to eat non-fattening foods while the rest of the party devours spaghetti and meat balls, frog legs dipped in butter, chocolate eclairs or other delectable dishes forbidden to me;
Being alone when I feel blue;
Messy-looking rooms;
Losing my temper.

I REMEMBER: How much we used to laugh at home when I was little.
My mother playing her guitar while my sister and I clowned. She'd sit on the bed or perch on the arm of a chair and play for us and sing and laugh while we made up routines. There was always noise and I used to ache from laughing.

The Awful Truth

They met briefly in London, caught up with one another again at a Hollywood party and were married at Lake Arrowhead. With them here, Mlle. Tocquet, the bride's companion.

WHEN the young, the tender, the inexperienced meet disillusion, Hollywood sheds a tear—is solemn for the space of a breath in deference to what-might-have-been.

When two people like Cary Grant—the handsome, the rich, the successful and sophisticated motion picture star—and Barbara Hutton, fabulously wealthy graduate of two divorces, announce that their marriage is to end, there is only a shrug of shoulders as a silent requiem to love. A smug what-could-you-expect look in every eye.

And yet, no two people deserve more compassion than Barbara and Cary. For neither is essentially to blame.

To both, love is precious. And they tried desperately to keep it so.

For both, their marriage began as a refuge and a promise of a new and better private world, and they tried to make their hopes come true.

As this story is being written, there seems no possible chance of a reconciliation. But even if there is a reconcilia- (Continued on page 76)

Cary's wife should have been a self-assured woman, emotionally adjusted, free to cater to his every mood, ready to help solve his every problem. Barbara wasn't such a woman.

What's behind the Grant-Hutton break-up? Unfortunately "the truth" is that their marriage had too many counts against it, at the start. It just couldn't last

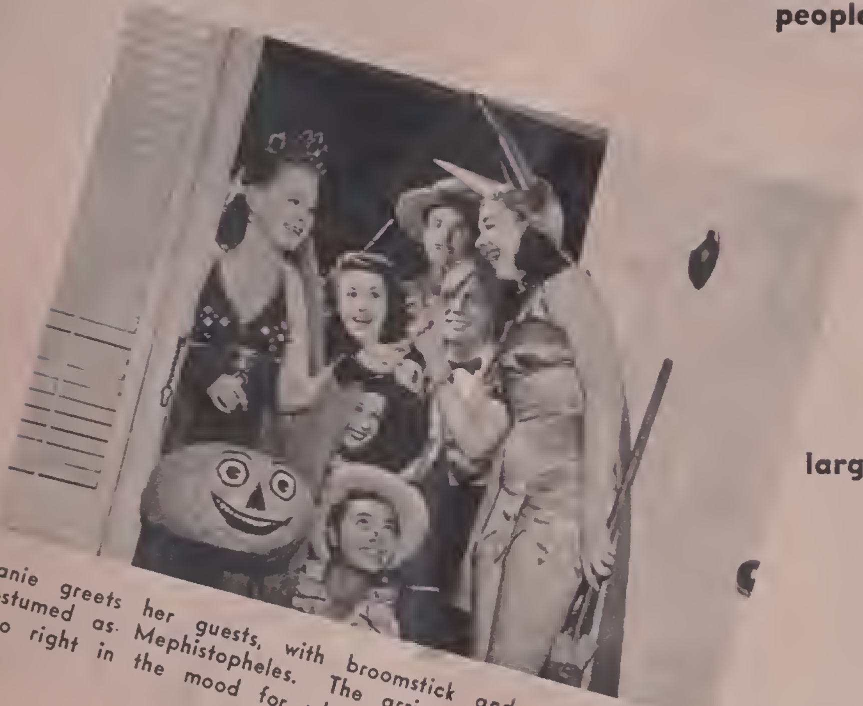
HOLLYWOOD HALLOWE'EN

Something's always happening in Hollywood! To some people—we'll even go so far as to say most of us—it's all synonymous with fantasy. But pull up an exclamation point while we show you the pictorial record of a Hollywood party that was strictly Turnip Corners or Painted Post, or even as you and I would plan it. The party was a Hallowe'en affair, staged by seventeen-year-old Jane Withers—held at her home, which is ideally equipped for parties, having a large rumpus room with a soda fountain bar, phonograph-radio and plenty of room for the slick chicks to go the limit in rug-cutting without bumping into the furniture. The most astonishing feature of the party is that there was nothing at all astonishing about it. However, the pictures tell the story.



Janie greets her guests, with broomstick and costumed as Mephistopheles. The arrivals are also right in the mood for what's traditional.

Four girls and four boys were invited, but one of the boys couldn't make it because he had to report next morning to take his army physical.

Discovering the damages. This chocalate cake suffered somewhat in transit, and June Carlson and Mary Alice Dill are oh but so vedy dismayed.

So much depends on the viewpoint, we always say! Jane gives the impression of being so charmed by Dave Street. His hat, mebbe?

Distaff side of the party pitches in to fix dainty little morsels that pass for chow at such affairs. And who says it ain't good?

We take you behind the bar at the soda fountain to show you that there is nothing phoney about this set-up. The bar has all the flavors and Jane knows all the recipes.

One, two, three—umps. What would a modern party be without a Conga? Even Mr. Pumpkin thinks it's fun!

What gives here is an old-fashioned horse race. Proof that the time-honored games invented by our grandparents are still much remembered—in movieland, just as down at Prairy Corners.

Ross Hunter and his hostess take the floor for a smooth 'n easy rhumba, while the rest of the gang makes with the music and the cheer-section.

They had dunking for apples, too—but of course. And here Jane and Jeanne Howlitt dive together, with Ross Hunter appointed to judge the winner.

Comes next a game of musical chairs, done just the same way that we ordinary folks do it. And you see now what we meant, saying parties like this can't really get going without lots of space.

Hail and farewell, with a very feminine squeal for a last bit of scarestuff about witches and goblins. Had a nice time kids? Well then, thank the lady!

Pretty Miss Carlson had a ripping bit of fun—too ripping—and her obliging hostess is applying the stitch in time with what appears to be a grim thread of determination. Right you are, too—it's Van Johnson in the photo at right.

The evening ends with a Hallowe'en joke played on Eric Sinclair—his family chariot gets souped up, but pullenty!

MY PAL PAT

BY CAROLE LANDIS

WE WERE on location at Del Monte, Director Eddie Sutherland, Pat O'Brien, George Murphy and I, getting outdoor shots for the new RKO picture called "Having Wonderful Crime." As I was walking through the lobby of the Del Monte Lodge one afternoon, I chanced to overhear a conversation between two Air Corps officers.

One said, "Look! There goes Pat O'Brien."

And the other said, "I sure like him in pictures. I wonder what sort of a guy he really is."

The answer to that question, as those having the golden opportunity of meeting Pat and getting to know him would inevitably discover for themselves, is that he is one of the friendliest, most generous, most amusing and jovial men on earth.

I met Pat when he was one of the top stars at Warner Bros. and I was one of the stock players.

1. Fair damsel with pur-suiters! It's Carole Landis with George Murphy and Pat O'Brien in a scene for RKO's "Having Wonderful Crime." Location shots were taken at Del Monte.

2. His heart belongs to Mama, for Pat classifies as "the devoted husband." When away from home (bond tours 'n' things) he telephones his wife regularly twice every day.

3. Get three Irishmen together and if their names are O'Brien, Murphy and Eddie Sutherland, you'll know why Del Monte has never been quite the same since they were there.

4. Pat may seem a little dubious about what Charles Brown is telling him, but he's a regular guy. Doesn't steal camera advantages, never goes high-hat, always a friend.

MY PAL PAT CONTINUED

It's really Pat O'Brien and he does really fall into the pool for his next picture, as you see it happening here. First the prop men set the cameras, then the scene is rehearsed, then O'Brien takes the plunge

No one, excepting a college freshman who has just been through initiation week and who has been befriended by a senior, can appreciate what it means to a newly signed actress to be noticed by an established actor. Noticed, I mean, in a friendly, utterly impersonal way.

Pat was like that. When we played scenes together he always gave me the camera advantage. I blew my lines in one scene and nearly died of chagrin. About three takes later, Pat—who is a fast study and a one-take man—blew his lines. Gallant is the word for Mr. Pat O'Brien, and the loikes of 'im ye'll seldom find.

I had friends in Colton (a small California town) whose six-year-old daughter was a pet of mine. Because I enjoyed her so much, I brought her to Hollywood for a few days' visit and took her out on the set with me. Pat walked up at once and made friends with the child, to her intense delight. The three of us had luncheon at noon in The Green Room, and by 3:30 p.m., that little girl was all set to marry Pat as soon as she got out of High School. The average man, confronted by her wide-eyed proposal, would have laughed—or worse yet, explained that he was already married and a father. Not Pat. He agreed solemnly to her plan, saying that if she still felt that way about him when she was graduated, he would consider himself engaged.

My option was dropped by Warners', so I went to New York hoping to do a stage play. Although I was given several rather good parts, the plays were ill-fated. So, back I went to Hollywood, still looking for a break.

Now much as I love this town, I am forced to admit that there are times when the Hollywood attitude toward the down-on-luck could be improved. A person whose option has been dropped by a major studio, and who has failed to score in Manhattan, is due for some rude shocks. I was astonished to discover how many myopic "friends" I had made; I was further hurt to discover how short were the memories for faces of those "friends." It would seem that I had acquired a quaint ailment distinguished by two symptoms: either I was quite invisible; or, when visible, I was quite unrecognizable.

I was just becoming reconciled to that state of affairs when, as I was seated in a night club one evening, in came Pat O'Brien. He spied me, made a B-line for my table and yelled, "Carole, baby, glad to see you! Swell to have you back in town. What's new?" And he sat down with that air of finality which indicated that he had joined us for the evening.

A good many people spoke to Pat that night, and then perforce to me, while I sat there batting back tears of gratitude and saying in my soul, "God bless all the O'Briens everywhere."

When I heard recently that Pat had organized his own producing company (Terneen Productions) and was planning to make "Secret Command," I wondered fleetingly if there might be a part in it for me. I was soon notified that I was to have the feminine lead.

It turned out to be one of the best parts I have ever had. When the picture was previewed the critics were wonderfully kind in their comments on the job I had done. I hope that doesn't sound conceited. I wanted to make the statement because it has a sequel: it would be almost impossible for an actress to give a bad performance opposite Pat O'Brien, because he is an impressive craftsman, a thoroughly expert dramatic technician.

There is a persistent rumor around town that, even if a man is a brilliant actor, it doesn't necessarily follow that he is a great gentleman. I might go so far as to admit that I have met a few impressive Thespians who thought Lord Chesterfield designed sofas.

DOUGHGIRLS VS HOME GIRLS

AMERICA's women have gone to war. The question now is: what place will those women assume in the post-war world?

Those who have donned uniforms and gone into service. Those who have put on coveralls and gone to work in the defense plants. Those who have entered fields previously dominated by men. Are they merely doing jobs which needed doing, or have they started careers in which they will expect to continue?

Consider, on the one hand, what it means to some, having acquired the independence of earning their own paychecks. How others, who might have preferred to marry, rear their children and maintain their homes, will be discouraged by the fact that the war has decreased their matrimonial opportunities.

The assumption, in some cases, may be that their defense jobs are a way of marking time for the duration, and they'll be only too glad when their men come home and they can go back to their kitchens, to their bridge clubs and peacetime community service projects.

Which, in your opinion, will be the choice of the majority: will the American "doughgirls" resume their pre-war places as "homegirls"? Will those who have never had their own homes take marriage in preference to a career?

Possibly you can speak from your own experience, or from knowing women who will have this decision to make. Or, you can accept this as an opportunity for merely stating your opinion. But give reasons for your recommendation, whichever it is.

Jane Wymon, Alexis Smith and Ann Sheridan are the "Doughgirls" in the new Warner Brothers picture.

The Terrific TURHAN

He's young, unmarried and believes in love at first sight. He's six-feet-one and goodlooking, the modern Valentino

By ALICE TRAINE

TURHAN SELAHETTIN SCHULTAVY BEY attracted fan attention long before any studio took him seriously.

I don't know what caught fans' fancy in the first flashes of him in other people's pictures. Maybe it was those Valentino eyes. They are warm, brown and properly mysterious; he has a habit of half-closing them when he looks at you, just as the Sheik did years and years ago.

They are talking of starring him in the role of Rudolph Valentino, you know. Not that he's in favor of it—he's superstitious and thinks it unlucky to step into a dead man's shoes. He'll do it, if requested by his studio—they've been kind to him and he trusts them—but he won't throw up his hat at the chance.

Maybe fans had better write in and tell him what they think about it. It was their enthusiasm that brought Turhan from bits to featured roles, and from heavies to romantic leads.

Boys and girls saw the young Turk flash across the screen, remembered him from single scenes and demanded more of him.

"When I put up my black-out curtains" (wrote a girl in England under the blitz of 1941). "I wonder if THEY are coming (Continued on page 62)

Born in Vienna, Turhan loves music. Often creates his own "mood music" when at work on a picture, if he can find a piano handy on the set.

Born in London, daughter of the British stage star Moyna Macgill, Angela Lansbury came to this country as a child escaping the blitzes.

The cockney maid in M-G-M's "Gaslight," she has since made "National Velvet" with Mickey Rooney and plays the unhappy girl role in "Dorian Gray."

Dream Girl

As a little girl in England Angela Lansbury always dreamed of going to Hollywood. She's eighteen now, and that dream has come true

LIFE is just a bowl of cherries to Angela Lansbury. All her childhood dreams have come true.

She's tall—five foot, seven—eighteen, blonde with enormous blue eyes and ripely red lips. She still has some of her baby plumpness, but her poise is that of a world-sophisticate.

You can get anything if you really want it, is her comforting philosophy.

"I don't believe in Fate or Destiny sitting up somewhere holding the threads of life and jerking us around like so many puppets," she observes, earnestly. "I've wanted things desperately. I wanted to come to this country, to see New York and Hollywood, and I've always wanted to be an actress. Well, now I have what I longed for. Or could it be that I'm lucky?"

Angela can't remember when she didn't long to be an actress. When she was two, her mother, Moyna Macgill, was one of the most popular leading ladies in London theatres, a member of a particularly delightful, gay and brilliant circle of celebrities. Baby Angela lived on the fringe of that circle, going everywhere her mother went (at least during waking moments), and loving every second of it.

That rosy, sunny-topped mite knew the intense excitement of first nights, the heart-chill of the curtain's rising, the triumph of (Continued on page 82)

ALEXANDER KNOX... without Wilson

He's really young enough to be his screen son, which is how thoroughly his personal identity has been confused by the roles he's played

THE picture "Wilson" was in the process of production at 20th Century-Fox Studios for five months. During that time, Director Henry King became rather thoroughly acquainted with the star of the work, Alexander Knox.

They conferred daily from early until late on bits of business, methods of handling a scene, and other items of technique. The sight of Wilson's flat-topped coiffeur, his spectacles, his ascetic, scholarly face became as familiar to Henry King as his own image in the shaving mirror.

Two days after the picture was completed, Mr. King attended a social gathering. Across the room, a young man waved at him. Mr. King furrowed his brow in a bewildered attempt to place the chap in memory, both face and physique were arresting. His hair was light brown and somewhat tumbled. His eyes were the forthright blue of deep Canadian lakes. The contours of his face were somewhat rounded. He was dressed in impeccable gray flannels.

Mr. King gave it up. He knew he had seen the gentleman somewhere . . . or, better, he must have known his father. The young man insisted upon approaching the vague Mr. King. Not until the director's shoulder was firmly slapped did he recognize the man with whom he had been working for five months. "Great guns!" he gasped. "Alexander Knox . . . without Wilson!"

This was not Mr. Knox' first knowledge of the confusion between his aged dramatic identity and his young actual self. When he was doing a part in "Romeo And Juliet" the omniscient Brooks Atkinson observed in his critical column that great praise was due "those seasoned veterans, Halliwell Hobbes, Dame May Whitty, and Alexander Knox."

The histrionic power which enables Mr. Knox—who won't have a gray hair for twenty years—to portray oldsters with such phenomenal success has been generated both by training and by an extraordinary background, including several noteworthy aunts.

His maternal Aunt Sarah was a forthright creature distinguished by great presence of mind and fortitude of conduct. She taught literature to the daughters of nice local sultans in a girls' school in Smyrna. Upon arriving on the dock one day, after a wearying journey from England, she turned from viewing the city in time to see a thief making off with her bag. With one hand she firmly clasped her elegant Gay Nineties hat; with the other she clutched a rugged British umbrella, cudgel fashion. Wasting no time, she shot in pursuit of the thief, her bustle abob.

Shrewdly he turned into the native quarter, a place into which police ventured only in threes. Undaunted, Aunt Sarah charged after the miscreant. Lighter, fleeter, and with higher morale than he, she overtook him, rapped him soundly with her umbrella, retrieved her bag and returned to the dock a perfect gentlewoman in command of her environment.

From this aunt, Alexander Knox inherited his presence of mind, a quality that stood him in good stead while he was working with Laurence Olivier in "Romeo And Juliet." (Continued on page 85)

Alexander Knox was selected for the Wilson role, not because he looks particularly like the late president (that similarity was accomplished by make-up experts), but because his voice is right.

By MARCIA DAUGHTREY

To make the picture more convincingly real, it's important that Knox have no identity other than as the screen Mr. Wilson. So you're shown no photos of him, as himself.

It was Warner Bros. who first brought Knox to Hollywood. He played in "The Sea Wolf," with Edward G. Robinson. "This Above All" was his next, and then "None Shall Escape."

Lon McCallister

By KATHERINE LAKE

"CALIFORNIA" in KHAKI

The "Private" life of Lon McCallister. G-I Joe on duty, of all places—in Hollywood!

GREAT things are afoot out at 20th Century-Fox Studios where Moss Hart's Air Force show, "Winged Victory," is being immortalized in celluloid. As you probably know, the idea for "Winged Victory" emanated from General Arnold himself, as he felt that a rousing show, dramatizing the training given the Air Force, would be morale-building for both the military and civilian populations.

Working in "Winged Victory" are such cinemen as Staff Sergeant George Reeves, late of "So Proudly We Hail," Sergeant Edmund O'Brien, esteemed for his work opposite Deanna Durbin in "The Amazing Mrs. Halliday," Staff Sergeant Mark Daniels and Corporal Don Taylor, Metro contract players—and Private Lon McCallister, whom you know as "California" from "Stage Door Canteen," and as Sparke in "Home in Indiana."

The manner in which Lon was cast in "Winged Victory" is a struggling young actor's dream: he was ordered to report for the part. No tests, no wangling by agents, no dickering for terms—just the terse military command, and he was on his way from Camp Crowder (where he had been working with a unit ordered on the road for the purpose of recruiting WAC members) to Santa Monica, where the "Winged Victory" company is quartered.

In the army since last January, Private Lon McCallister was brought to Hollywood from Camp Crowder to play a cadet role in 20th Century-Fox' version of Moss Hart's "Winged Victory."

Quartered in regulation tents at Santa Monica and reporting every day for work at the studio, the boys get in their physical conditioning between scenes.

When his running expenses are deducted, Lon has only $21 left from his monthly army paycheck. But he gets by, and manages to finance dates with his best girl.

Tale of a Town

The "Little Hollywood" of Utah. Population, 1200; situated 133 miles from the nearest railroad; principal industries, cattle-raising and moviemaking. Location for the filming of more than 40 motion pictures.

PARRY LODGE COTTAGES

It's a gay time in the old town tonight! Dancing at the lodge is an every Saturday night event.

KANAB sits, rather sleepily, about as far from a railroad or telegraph office as it's possible to get, in these United States.

Most of the year, it's a quiet, elm-shaded, lazy Southern Utah town of 1200 people. Cows raise dust down the main street as they are herded in one's and two's to and from the milking barns behind compact little homes and pastures.

Yet with increasing regularity, Mrs. Della Pugh parks her children with a neighbor while she stands in for movie stars — Maureen

Everybody else in Kanab gets a chance to be in pictures, says Roddy's pal Pullman. So what about a Dachshund?

Time out for chow, and a hungry bunch it is, too! Preston Foster, Rita Johnson and Roddy McDowoll, lined up all in a row. Extras at the table opposite the stars are local ranch hands hired as movie horse wranglers.

O'Hara, Linda Darnell or some other. Postmaster Clair Ford steps onto the screen as a typical small-town business man or a middle-aged farmer. "Cowhide" Adams, a rancher, displays his roping ability for Hollywood dollars. Bishop Daniel Frost and Bishop Joseph Johnson of the Church of Latter Day Saints—it's Mormon country—put on chaps and are movie cowboys or stuntmen.

It would be a surprised Brigham Young, were he to pay a visit here now. Back in 1861, he sent Jacob Hamblin down to make friends of the Indians so the Mormon empire could use the fine grazing land for cattleraising. After the Indians had one or two massacre parties, Jacob Hamblin succeeded in accomplishing his mission. And 95 per cent of the town's population today carries one or another of eight family names—Hamblin, Pugh, Judd, Johnson, Chamberlain, Brown, Adams or Stewart—indicating that descendants of the original settlers thrived. Yes, and prospered.

Cattle grazing, of course, doesn't explain why 20th Century-Fox Studios paid a board and lodging bill of some $6,000 a week on their picture "Thunderhead" last summer in Kanab. Nor why four other studios sent casts and crews up there from Hollywood.

But besides land for cattle grazing, there are untold numbers of vividly colored canyons climaxed by Zion and Bryce National Parks and Cedar Breaks. There are great pine forests, Indian reservations—and the Parry Bros.

While a student at Utah State University, Chaunce Parry was in a surveying party working in Southern Utah. Being so impressed by Zion and Bryce Canyons,

Tale of a Town

Just like any other small town, in most respects, it's having the movie people there that makes Kanab different. With entertainers like Diana Hale, direct from Hollywood.

Sheriff George Swapp is listed on the studio payroll as camp cook. Here he is small Diana Hale's dancing partner.

Life in "the big city" attracts few of the young people of Kanab. Those who leave soon hurry back. Nurse Viola Mitchell went to New York, the movies lured her back, and she has a steady job now as studio nurse, administering first aid to the injured.

Roddy goes truly "western" when he's at Kanab; likes to collect stories from oldtimers about the early days.

Land where Zane Grey wrote his first novels, advertised to the world by the movies made there. People descended from the Brigham Young party, help to make those movies.

"This is the life," testifies Preston Foster, strumming a ukulele and making with a cowboy song for the amusement of little Diana, Rita Johnson and Roddy. Foster often comes back to Kanab, when his picture assignments are through, to hunt deer and lions.

he quit college and obtained a franchise from the state to take tourists through the two canyons. Later Arizona gave him the franchise for the North Rim of the Grand Canyon. In 1919, he succeeded in getting the two Utah canyons declared national monuments. His two brothers, Whit and Gron, joined him in setting up a transportation system through the parks. Up to that time, less than a thousand persons had seen the canyons. In 1920, they were declared national parks and tourists flocked there. In 1927, the brothers sold their franchise to the Union Pacific Railroad for a healthy sum.

The three brothers set out then to make their life elsewhere, but were drawn irresistibly back to the spectacular country. They hit upon an idea. Because Zane Grey had written his first successful novels in Kanab, Tom Mix and Buck Jones (among other Western stars) had asked the Parry brothers to arrange a few location trips for them.

Why not make this a regular business?

In 1931, they purchased the (Continued on page 74)

Exclusive Gene Tierney interview, the first she's given about her little daughter, who is a . . .

WAR Baby

BY RILLA PAGE PALMBORG

Gene Tierney (Mrs. Oleg Cassini) thinks having a baby is a young wife's best protection against "duration blues." Her little Daria serves as a constant reminder of the husband who's away in service, makes her plan for the future.

"HAVING a baby is the greatest thing that ever happened to me," said Gene Tierney.

We were lunching at 20th Century-Fox studio, Gene is playing the title role in "Laura," her first picture in over a year. Slim, beautiful and exotic as ever, Gene took little notice of the exciting gaiety of the studio cafe or the admiring glances turned her way. Baby Daria is always an all-absorbing subject to her mother.

"If I live to be a hundred I'll never forget the elation and thrill of holding my baby in my arms for the first time," Gene continued. "The fact that she was a girl instead of a boy (I had been adamant about wanting a boy) never entered my head. She was just what I wanted.

"With the first thrill, though, there was disappointment, too—when I wakened after the baby was born and discovered that no one but my nurse was with me. It had always been uncertain about my husband's getting there. But Mother! Where was my mother?

"It didn't help when the nurse said the doctor had asked her to leave—that I must rest. Didn't my family know I had a baby? I had to talk about her! I wanted to shout my news to the world!

"I think I cried a little when I could get neither Mother nor my sister on the telephone. I found small comfort when finally I got a call through to my aunt in New Jersey. Poor dear, she was afraid I was over-exerting because I was so excited. All she could say was, 'You shouldn't be talking now, darling. Please hang up the telephone and get some rest.'

She kept house for her husband, until just before the baby came. He was stationed at Fort Riley and they had a little cottage nearby.

"I thought I would never hear from Oli. He didn't receive my telegram about the baby for a week. As sometimes happens, he couldn't be reached at the army base, where he was stationed as a cavalry instructor. But I consoled myself, realizing how lucky I was that he was still in the United States.

"When the wire reached him Oli was so upset and worried over the baby's "WITH her Sun in the powerful, penetrating sign Scorpio harmoniously related to her Moon, this affectionate and warm-hearted star (Gene Tierney) woud seem to have success by luck and the favors of others.

Born November 20, she has a capacity for hard work, a great practicality, the capacity for deep thought, and the will to take great pains. There is no detail too small for her to consider.

She is endowed with astuteness, the ability to see ahead of others, and an extreme sensitiveness which may be too often expressed in quick temper soon forgotten. This latter is because Mercury, in its relationship to her Moon, has made her inordinately honest and sensible.

She has unusual artistic ability and taste, a deep and mystic love of music, enormous enthusiasms and the natural health to enjoy sports and outdoor activities and carry on her exacting work with undue physical strain. This is partially because Jupiter's position to her Moon (and also to her Mercury) allow her utter relaxation when she lets tension down. She enjoys life to the fullest, accepting sensibly the popularity rightly her's, guarding her private life carefully from the enervating results of her own love of hospitality, and securing her financial present and future with a sometimes spartan self-denial.

Few guess the privation, the fear, the patience, the struggle to suppress jealousy which has attended her rise to stardom, for there is a restless anxiety ever present but well hidden beneath her surface gaiety. A rebel against conventions, broken ideals have been repaired painstakingly and she has learned during 1944 that it was a period of advancement and hard work, rather than one of inner content and outer happiness.

A rare young lady, this. One thing her chart is insistent upon is this: limitations have taught her always to think things over, follow her own sober judgment, and be prepared to work and pay herself for whatever goal she sets. And control of vocal range and tone is eventual control of mental processes—and that whatever failure or lack she may face is entirely due to not listening to her own advice.

Whatever the coming year holds for this beautiful and gifted lady, she is assured of discovering herself at the goal she set last New Year's Day—and beyond it.

SCORPIO, FOR THOSE PERSONS BORN BETWEEN OCT. 24 AND NOV. 23

AFTER the uncertainty and responsibilities which the year presented as a New Year's gift, the worries and disappointments concerning broken promises and financial adjustments, your natural energy and strength gave you courage to fight through and, in a large measure, attain whatever seemed most important.

Making up your mind which course to follow was your main difficulty, for while you can usually visualize the results of your actions, this year held them tantalizingly veiled, and the outcome was of such importance that you may have hesitated until through sheer desperation you carried your plans blindly to fulfillment. Luck was indeed with you. In some cases, you just avoided disaster by a miracle.

If you do not crowd this luck too far, do not gamble with stakes which are not rightfully yours, you will reap a big reward the coming year—financially, too. Let troubles with relatives or those near you more or less solve themselves, and avoid any jealousy or thought of petty revenge. Changes concerning your home should be handled with tact and consideration, but never think your ambitions are too high, for that same luck is with you if you keep your head and hold your plans secret until fulfilled.

Settle finances during November, protect your earnings for the future, and watch throughout December to stay apart from an involved situation which could easily prove unpleasant unless you are impersonally silent. words of music

By JILL WARREN

COME on in, Individuals, and we'll cut up some musical stuff. As usual, I have been snooping around for news, so put the homework aside for a short spell, and I'll give forth with some tid-bits.

First off we have mail from some of our music makers who are giving out with American jive in far away lands and places. From "Somewhere in England" comes a letter from Captain Glenn Miller, dated August 3, 1944. "Dear Jill:

"Your letter was forwarded to me here. We left the U. S. A. last month. It's the 'Flying American Band of The Supreme Allied Command' now. We have been playing a seven-day-a-week broadcast schedule over the Allied Expeditionary Forces Network, which is beamed to the Allied troops in Normandy and the entire ETO (European Theatre of Operations). In addition, we fly the whole band, comprising forty-seven pieces, to the air bases all over the ETO, and the reception accorded by the pilots, navigators, bombardiers, and ground crews is terrific. For most of them it's the first entertainment in a musical vein they have had.

Tom Breneman, emcee, Bandleader Frankie Masters and Jill, guests on the "Breakfast at Sardi's" show recently

"We spent some time in London and we can tell you all about the famous flying bombs! (Reporting from all too direct personal experience.) However, I'm not permitted to reveal more than that now.

"We've heard from Tex Beneke since we've been here. He is still Chief Bandmaster at a naval base in Norman, Oklahoma.

"Thanks for your letter and I'll look forward to hearing from you again. Send a copy of MOVIELAND, too. Sincerely, Glenn."

"What's this with the hair up—all new material?" Frankie asks Jill, at rehearsal for a Vimm's show.

MOVIELAND'S

FIVE BEST PICTURES OF THE MONTH

DARRYL F. ZANUCK'S Technicolored drama—the film biography of Woodrow Wilson—is picture making at its best.

A biography of the 28th President of the United States, on the one hand—tracing Wilson's career from the day he was asked to run for Governor of New Jersey to the noon of March 4, 1921, when in saying goodbye to his Cabinet he acknowledged his personal defeat but declared that "The ideals of the League of Nations aren't dead"—it is at the same time a history of World War I, with some scenes made particularly effective by being actual newsreel clips.

Technically speaking, the story was made difficult to handle by very reason of the fact that it attempts to accomplish so much.

In the main, however, the picture excels—in brilliance of production, cast, sets. More important, it serves a well-intentioned and highly commendable purpose, being a story that commands nationwide attention—and timely that attention is, too—to the problems and happenings of one of the most critical eras in our country's history.

It is no more "political" than that, and there is no actual basis for partisan antagonists to ascribe a propaganda intent.

Alexander Knox is superb in the title role, prominently supported by Geraldine Fitzgerald, Sir Cedric Hardwicke, Vincent Price, Ruth Nelson, Mary Anderson, and Charles Coburn.

WILSON

ARSENIC AND OLD LACE

(Warner Bros.)

CARY GRANT, it's readily agreed when we see him in a farce like this long-shelved film version of Joseph Kesselring's stage play, is "at his best" in light comedy.

It's a most unusual "funny picture," for madly enough it's the story of how two sweet but completely crazy old ladies living in an old house in the strangely secluded Heights section of Brooklyn manage to commit murder on such wholesale scale that the score-keeping becomes almost as great a problem as making room for the corpses.

Detailed for the gravedigging assignment, as each of the murder victims finds his way into the Brewster cellar, is Teddy "Roosevelt" Brewster (John Alexander), who performs his burial tasks with no questions asked, being convinced that the deceased are merely yellow fever casualties.

Among other reasons for Cary's finding this a troublesome family in which to be a nephew, he's in love with his brand new bride (Priscilla Lane) and wanting to protect her from knowing what he himself so belatedly discovered: that he's saddled with an assortment of relatives who are murderously insane.

Not to be outdone by the old aunts, there's another Brewster nephew (Raymond Massey) claiming a "stiff" total of thirteen.

Anyway, the whole thing will leave you thinking "everybody's crazy but me"—and you won't be so sure about "me"!

"KISMET," a movie for the third time since originating as a stage play for Otis Skinner, gains much from the addition of color and modern dimensional effects.

Lavishness of production, innovations in the story treatment and conscious striving for a fairy tale effect all contribute to making the picture essentially a fantasy.

With Ronald Colman in the romantic role as Haifiz and Marlene Dietrich as Jamilla—reigning queen, so to speak, in the Grand Vizier's household—the new version introduces a second love theme. And the scenes with Miss Dietrich, though limited in number, are as if specially created for displaying the golden legs "all as advertised."

Meanwhile, as Papa does a-wooing go, the heart of his lovely daughter Marsinah (played by Joy Ann Page) is being romantically won by the handsome young Caliph (James Craig), disguised (all but his Swanee accent) as a raggedy gardener's son.

Ronald Colman is excellently cast and deserving of "best performance" credit. His charm transcends the humble garb and demeanor of being a mere beggar, adds much to the magic of his being a magician, and blooms forth in full force when he's the mythical Prince fulfilling fantastic promises to his daughter for making her the most envied young woman in all Arabia.

TILL WE MEET AGAIN

(Paramount)

PROVING that the stories to come out of the war are still coming, and that it's possible to thread a fine theme through a war situation needle without having it come out in knots of exploding bombs and noisesome frontline activity. "Till We Meet Again" is both inspiring and inspired.

Barbara Britton as Sister Clothilde, a young novice in a French convent, makes the most of her first starring role, turning it into an agreeably modernized version of Joan of Arc. In risking her life to assist the escape of an American pilot (Ray Milland) from occupied France, she willingly and knowingly sacrifices the personal peace and security which had compensated for belonging so little to the world beyond the convent walls.

But this is no ordinary escape story—nor is the bond that develops between the pretty Clothilde, and the pilot who misses the wife he loves back in the States, an ordinary romance formula. It was a deft and discerning hand that directed the scenes where these two build a bridge of understanding and caring, without trespassing beyond what is their right to claim. It's done so simply, yet what is obvious is merely apparent, not exaggerated.

In addition, the picture is a fitting and remarkably well-timed dedication to the accomplishments of the brave French patriots, fighting in "the underground."

"MARRIAGE is a private affair," this film title claims—but the problems of Theodora Scofield (Lana Turner) and Lt. Thomas West (John Hodiak) are representative fears-for-happiness common to many young couples in the real life of wartime.

Theirs is a story of a brief romance begun at the Officers' Canteen in Boston, culminating in a marriage not approved by the bride's much-married mother and based on the assumption that the bridegroom is about to be leaving for overseas duty.

Instead, Tom is discharged from the Army and kept at home for an essential war job. Theodora had planned to continue her frivolous existence, with Tom away, but finds herself saddled with a humdrum married life. Unsure of being able to make a go of things, on that basis, her faith is still more shaken when there's an approaching blessed event.

Her young husband has no such initial handicaps to happiness. There's the disillusionment of discovery in store for him, however, when Theodora seeks escape from the confines of home and family in the company of Capt. Miles Lancing (James Craig).

It's coincidental that Lana Turner is presented—yes, beautiful as usual—as a screen mother; for it's her first return to the screen since the birth of her own baby. Frances Gifford you'll cheer for giving a specially mentionable supporting player performance.

YOUR PROBLEM AND MINE

By

Bonita Granville

Dear Miss Granville:

I have been engaged to a soldier for three years, and twice when he was home on leave he begged me to marry him. I wanted to wait until I graduated, however.

Now this is my problem: he no longer writes to me—the last letter I received being in April—and an old friend of mine just came in town and he tells me that my fiancé is married to a girl near the camp where he is stationed.

I have cried and bitterly regretted that I didn't marry him when he asked me to. What do you think I should do?

Jean

Dear Jean:

First, you were perfecty right in waiting until you finish school before thinking of marriage.

I can't believe that this boy sincerely loved you if he married another girl.

Perhaps you are really better off being rid of him, under the circumstances.

Why not go out with other boys and enter into a new social life in your town? It may be hard for you now, but you have to forget him and that is the best way to start.

Good luck.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Miss Granville:

My problem includes a boy friend and my brother. You see, my brother is just a year older than I, and he is my boy friend's pal. This boy is a swell fellow, but he is terribly shy, and whenever we go out on dates he always includes my brother. Then the evening is ruined because they talk about airplanes and baseball all night long.

How can I get him to overcome his shyness, and what can I do with my brother?

Doris

Dear Doris:

First of all, make an ally of your brother and try to arrange a foursome with another girl the next time you all go out together.

Try and become interested in their conversation, even if you have to study up on the subjects, and then you can bring the boy out of his shyness by getting him to converse with you on the same subjects that he has confined to your brother. From then on, it is up to you to keep up an interest in his hobbies and sports activities.

Your problem is one that can be solved so easily, you see—but you must work at it.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Bonita:

I am engaged to a soldier, and he is nineteen and I am seventeen. But his folks think we are too young to get married. Also, we are of different religions, and my folks say we can never be happy being married with two different religions in the same house.

What do you think we should do?

Catherine

Dear Catherine:

You are very right in realizing these problems that face you, and in not marrying at such a young age.

It is always happier to discuss such problems with both parties' parents, and try to reach an amicable decision. While people do marry without their parents' blessing, I am sure it is a happier situation to try and discuss the many phases of these troubles together with your parents and reach a happy compromise.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Bonita:

This is a very personal problem, but I read in MOVIELAND about your column, and I feel sure you can help me. Please try to.

You see, I am only fourteen years old, but I do look older, and now the boys keep asking me to go out with them. But I don't think I am old enough to go out on dates with boys yet. And yet, how old should I be to go out?

Sallie

Dear Sallie:

First of all, I want to tell you that I admire your common sense in realizing that you are indeed too young to be going with boys. There are so many sports and activities that a young girl of your age can participate in; I am sure you can certainly use up any extra time you have left over after your studies and War Effort activities are taken care of.

You should discuss the problem with your mother. There can be no set rule for when a girl is old enough to start dating. And take my word for it, "Mother knows best!"

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Miss Granville:

This may sound silly to you, but I have a burning ambition to fly—yes, I am completely air-minded, although I am not yet fourteen.

I don't know of any school where I can get the necessary training for this career, and I wonder if you could suggest something for me, because I am really serious in wanting to learn all there is to know.

Nora

Dear Nora:

No, I don't see anything silly in your ambition to study aviation and learn to pilot a plane. As a matter of fact, I believe it is a fine thing for a girl of your age to have a goal in mind and then proceed to work toward it.

Why not read all the books available in your schools and libraries on aviation, and take your teacher into your confidence? She may let you do class projects on aviation to further your studies. Then, when you are old enough to go to a special aviation school, you will be that much better equipped.

Sincerely,
BG

But let's go back to the early days of "California's" military career. In January, Lon got those Greetings, and a few days later he was working his way through Fort MacArthur, which is the local induction center. Normally, recruits remain there only 24 to 48 hours, and are then assigned to a camp for basic training.

Lon, however, promptly distinguished himself by becoming an Old Settler at MacArthur. At the end of the usual 24 hours, he and a few others were still inmates of the Fort. One of these others should be explained.

While Lon was going through line after line on induction day, he noticed an impressive man with prematurely silver hair. "You're 'California,' aren't you?" the man asked guardedly.

Lon admitted his identity. "I know you from the days when I was doing radio work, don't I?" he added.

"That's right," said the man, looking very substantial. "I was 'The Shadow.' Legal name, Bill Johnstone."

So California and The Shadow became buddies. Other inductees tagged them as the father and son of the Fort. In honor of Bill's mane of white hair, Lon began to call his pal "White Savage," and Bill countered by calling Lon "Bud."

Each immediately was assigned to impressive new duties. The White Savage was Barracks Orderly and "California" was Latrine Orderly.

At the end of 48 hours the two orderlies were established and apparently permanent residents of the district, and at the end of a week, they were aboriginals. By this time each of them was so familiar in a nauseous sort of way with his duties that he was given three inductees to instruct in the delicate responsibilities of order and cleanliness.

A week went by—eight days, nine days, ten days. One night there were only five standbys sleeping in barracks normally housing ninety men. They tiptoed around and their voices were carefully lowered lest they awaken the echoes that, once disturbed, flew around the rafters like bats.

"Have you examined your G.I. twosome lately?" California asked the White Savage, having reference to the G.I. footwear in which they were slogging around. "I have a feeling that we've taken root. Maybe we're going to sweat out the war right here."

"I've got radio nerves," demurred The White Savage. "They pick up vibrations without fail, and right now I'm getting a message that says we're going to get shipped out tomorrow."

Lon, having great faith in his friend's psychic summons, telephoned his mother that night. "Don't cry," he warned. "And don't worry. I'll let you know where I am as soon as possible. Is Mac there?" Mac—full name McDanois—is Lon's Great Dane. He was nearby, and barked a greeting into the telephone.

Bill also called home and talked disconsolately to his adored wife and 14-year-old son.

Afterward, he and Lon were restless. Lights were out in the barracks at nine and bed check was at eleven. After the sergeant had gone through, Lon said guardedly to the White Savage, "Are you still awake?"

"Sure. Let's get up and go for a walk." So they emerged into the drenching downpour of a lashing California night. With slickers blowing around their legs and rivulets running off their fatigue hats, they strolled along the breakwater, talking. Bill talked about his family, his love for them, his loneliness for them, and his determination to fight his share of the war.

They both talked about radio work, and Bill discussed some of the early days of the industry, then he reminisced about his show-business days in New York. "That was quite a time. I remember seeing Texas Guinan riding down Broadway on a snow-white horse. . . ."

It was nearly three o'clock before they had, in this weatherbeaten way, told an indirect goodbye to the lives they had known and the persons they had loved, and set their faces toward the next step in their G. I. experience.

The next step turned out to be a Gulliver jump to Camp Crowder, Missouri.

At the end of the first four weeks of basic training, Lon, The White Savage, and several of their friends (including Russell Gleason) were given week-end passes, so they hopped a bus for Joplin. One of the group had been in town before and had spotted an excellent steak house. Toss 'em in the broiler, brother. Medium rare. A basket full of French fries. And a green salad. With plenty of coffee. Man, what a meal!

Afterward, pleasantly stuffed and turning a benevolent beam upon the evening, the gang went to a street carnival. They rode the ferris wheel and the carousel; they tried their skill at a shooting gallery and a toss-penny booth. Lon had wandered away from the group and was watching the crowd when a pretty girl, twirling several keys on a metal ring, sauntered up to him. "Lonesome, soldier?" she said, smiling into his eyes.

"Not especially," Lon said without emphasis, but pleasantly.

"I've got a car. Do you want to go for a ride?" she pursued.

Lon glanced toward his gang. "There are six of us," he said.

The girl gave him a look on which Sonja Henie could have made four skating pictures. "I wasn't asking SIX G.I.'s" she called over her shoulder as she strode away.

A few moments later, Lon and The White Savage were approached by a bobby soxer. "You're 'California,' aren't you?" she demanded.

Lon turned to Bill with pretended pride. "That's the third time tonight that someone has asked if I were Lon McCallister," he said, implying that a mistake repeats itself even worse than history.

The girl was not to be put off so easily. "Well, I know you're 'California,'" she announced triumphantly, "because of that little scar on your upper lip. It was made by your dog, nipping you. I read all about it in a magazine, so there. Now, how about your autograph?"

So he complied, remembering how many hours he had spent traveling from Hollywood to Missouri, yet thinking how little different they were, really.

Lon celebrated his twenty-first birthday just before he left Camp Crowder. His mother joined him (having traveled entirely by day coach from Los Angeles) and the troupe gave him a big party, complete with a package. When he opened the box he found a smooth pair of sun tan trousers with shirt to match. Lon's mother, reserving his real birthday gift until the war is over, gave him a big, businesslike clothes brush.

When he had finished his basic training, Lon was assigned to the troupe ordered to tour the central states on a WAC recruiting drive. The outfit traveled in two huge army busses and a couple of command cars. They had a thirty-piece band, strictly Dixieland, distinguished by some hot combos. The music was augmented by a series of skits. Mostly the outfit played colleges, and their recruiting efforts were so successful that the area in which they were working has the highest national induction quota of college WAC recruits.

It was in Omaha that Lon received orders to proceed at once to Santa Monica, to report there for work in "Winged Victory." He read the orders and issued a Comanche yell that would have made Sitting Bull's ten fiercest warriors sound like a case of laryngitis.

A few moments later, his jubilation diminished considerably. He would be leaving kids with whom he had spent a good many wonderful weeks; he would be leaving The White Savage.

Top girls in Lon's life are still Jeanne Crain and Nancy Walker, and his best boy friends (since the White Savage is in the East) are Bill Blythe and Ray Sperry.

When he gets a week-end pass, he still drives his battered Pontiac out to Malibu to see his Mom, his Grandmother and Grandfather; he romps with Mac along the beach, works in the garden, and paints furniture.

In summation, the word is that "California" in khaki is very much okay.

THE TERRIFIC TURHAN

over tonight. Then I think of you Turhan, and know you wouldn't be afraid. That makes me brave, too."

That's a sample of the kind of mail arriving at Universal Studios, addressed to Turhan Bey. Mail comes in at the rate of 2000 letters a week. It has kept pace and increased with each step in his career.

War doing what it does to spur romance, Hollywood screen heroes are nearly all married. Turhan is our most eligible bachelor—and likely to remain so, so he says. He has spent four happy years in Hollywood and never really fallen in love. Once, long ago, when he was sixteen, he fell hard.

"Too bad my first love had to be what it was," he comments, with a wicked little smile. "I have such a keen sense of the ridiculous I can never look back on it sentimentally, as I'm told is the rule.

"I was very young. She was thirty-five—beautiful, glamorous, very much the sophisticate. Her husband was one of my father's friends, and we met while she was trying to get a divorce. She was restless and unhappy; I was gay and—hard as you may find it to believe, as you gaze on this hardened old character beside you—said to have a certain charm. I could also make her laugh. And so, we fell in love.

"We were being entertained at a country house outside Vienna, and for two weeks the whole thing was romantic, hectic, intense. Then my mother heard of it, and arrived in great haste. There was much sound and fury, we all vowed this and that, and eventually the house burned down. Fortunately this event occurred after we had all left, but somehow whenever I think of a great love I see a tremendous burst of flame and a house going up in smoke.

"And then I laugh . . .

"You perceive that I am an embittered man, hard and moody. I pity the girl I marry, if ever I do marry."

Little devils danced in his eyes. Like as not, his heart is set on some lucky girl this minute. But he says: "I've heard there's such a thing as love at first sight—the lightning striking you suddenly so that you say: 'She's the One!' and don't know why. If that ever happens to me, I shall succumb at once. I wouldn't miss the great experience. But I feel that NOW is no time for love, and Hollywood no place for it."

Turhan was born in Vienna. His father was Turkish military attaché there when he met the Viennese belle who became his wife. Turhan, however, is considered to be a Turkish subject; as such, he's just received notice to return to Turkey for his eighteen months' military service, which must be served before he's thirty.

The "Bey" in his name was formerly a title. In ancient days, the Bey of a city or province was its ruler, the title handed down from father to son. Later it degenerated from its original meaning and a man who owned forty mules called himself "Bey", until everywhere you met Mohammed Bey, a rug merchant, Abdul Bey, who kept a night club.

The title the young Turk really cherishes is "Sheriff," pronounced "Shareef," meaning spiritual leader. This comes from his father, too. He won't use it here. People would expect him to come dashing out on an Arab horse, wearing a ten-gallon hat, stirrups, spurs, a badge with stars, shooting with both hands, he believes. Secretly, though, he hopes some day to live up to this title.

His parents separated while he was small and his was a turbulent childhood, half of it spent with an indulgent, adoring mother, half with an impatient, autocratic father.

"My father lost an arm in the first World War and is now president of Turkey's war veterans, a powerful organization comparable to your American Legion and wielding great political influence," said Turhan. "Father's exactly like me. You'd take him to be perhaps twenty-nine or thirty. I look like his not-so-much-younger brother. We're both obstinate, positive, uncompromising, so that we are best apart."

Always in revolt against discipline, Turhan had no formal schooling. At seven, he was entered in a school in Vienna, where he lasted a week. Tutors came and went rapidly during the next eight years. At fifteen he was persuaded to try another school, but neither the school nor Turhan could stand the association long. His mother gave up and he was free.

Money was no problem. His mother had her own fortune, his grandmother, a Czech, was also wealthy in her own right. His father had vast estates near Ankara and Istanbul. For five years the young rebel roamed where he willed, living in Budapest, Paris, Prague, Vienna during the half years he was not due in Turkey.

For the leisured classes before the war, life as he saw it was one long holiday.

From fifteen to twenty he sailed yachts, danced, hunted and rode in many famous cities and countries. He found a strange sense of peace pervading Budapest then, a dreamlike peace that had no feeling of lethargy. "In this country," he interpolated, "a restless pulse is always beating. You can't rest, you must go on. That is exciting to me and I love it."

By this time, everyone knows how a letter from a Parisian lawyer sent Turhan, his mother and grandmother, to California and Arthur Lubin, Universal director. Four years ago, none of the three could speak more English than it takes to order a meal. Mr. Lubin enrolled Turhan at Ben Bard's School of Speech, and a compulsory dramatic course led him swiftly to pictures.

In his first roles, he spoke with an accent. Now, as leading man to Susanna Foster in "The Climax" and "Bowery to Broadway," there's no trace of an accent.

He goes swiftly from picture to picture. He worked for months on "Dragon Seed" with Katharine Hepburn, now he's making "Queen of the Nile." His only week-long holiday in two years was last Christmas week. Turhan and his Turkish friend went to the mountains to ski. It was raining when they arrived, but it snowed that night and by morning the trails were white and the sport was exhilarating. Turhan says he's not an expert ski-er. (He claims he's not an expert anything.) But he took his first ski lesson when he was seven.

"There was nothing to do in the mountains at night," relates Turhan, "so we joined the hunt for zoot-suiters who had taken possession of summer cabins in the deep woods. The kids were hiding out from police and the great night sport was catching them. Exciting to creep up to dark cabins and make a rush—just like pictures. We found traces of them, fires that hadn't gone out, but never a zoot-suiter. I'm afraid I was a little on their side, because I felt that if the cabins were empty all winter and zoot-suiters needed shelter, why not use them? Fortunately, I wasn't around when any of the kids were caught."

Turhan feels that it's a mistake to underestimate film audiences. They are ready for intelligent, interesting pictures. True, they won't accept the straight "message" film, because they find it dull—which it is. They'd rather have straight entertainment than that. But they prefer a combination of the two.

His favorite fan letter came from a woman in Philadelphia, who wrote to thank him for her pleasure in "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves."

"As I watched the picture" (said she) "I forgot I had a husband, three children and a home to care for, that my funds were limited and my problems plentiful. I was a little girl again, hearing a fairytale, believing once more that the world is a lovely place, the future full of beauty and excitement."

"That," says Turhan, "is what pictures are meant to do."

BETTY HUTTON

My first public appearance. It was in Bath, Michigan; I was seven and wore my first party dress, brown velvet, and sang The Song of the Nile. It was a waltz and my teachers expected me to sing it straight; I expected to sing it that way, too, but somehow there I was swinging it, shocking the daylights out of the audience, until they got to liking it and began to clap. I remember how relieved and delighted I was that they took it so well.

The first time I saw Robert Taylor in a picture and how I fell for him. Till then I'd had a baby crush on John Gilbert, but when Bob Taylor came leaping in through a window on the screen, I took one look and—bam! I was done for. I was just like a Sinatra fan of today. Boy, can I sympathize?

The first time I went to dinner with Vincent Lopez, after he'd engaged me to sing with his band. I was almost fifteen, it was my first formal dinner. I was dismayed at the array of silver by my plate. I looked at it—I'd never seen so many knives, forks and spoons for one dinner—and everything ran together. I couldn't imagine how to use them. I held back and watched people from under my lashes to see what they picked up before I chose anything. I was dreadfully embarrassed, I thought the whole party was looking at me, I didn't know what I was eating, and I wasn't old enough to make a joke of the affair.

I'M GUILTY OF:

Never answering letters;
Spending too much money;
Flying into a temper, speaking my mind, then rapidly cooling off and wishing I'd controlled myself.

I HAVE:

An inferiority complex—a bad one. I don't like to meet new people. At least I don't like the thought of meeting new people, but if I warm up to them at once, I enjoy it.

MY IDEAS ARE ALWAYS CHANGING:

Maybe I can't tell you much about the real ME, because I'm not sure, myself.

I used to love to go out dancing every night. In New York, the evenings were never long enough. I'd go to night clubs, meet all my friends, have a wonderful time, and hate to go home.

In Hollywood, I'm usually tired after making pictures all day. I go to my dressing-room and relax with a coke, if it's hot, a cup of tea or coffee, if it's chilly, while Doris, my hairdresser, fixes my hair. We run over to Lucey's for dinner. It's like a gathering of the clans there. We know each other, everyone kids and has fun, there are no candid cameras snapping. Then perhaps a friend or two will go home with me to my apartment. I've had it done over and now I use the beautiful fireplace. I'm glad when we can build a fire and sit before it and talk, talk, talk.

If I'm alone, I play my records—romantic pieces, really romantic! I don't care to listen to swing.

Week ends, I ask friends in for dinner, which I cook myself.

I CAN COOK:

Yes, I'm a good cook, not a modest one. I get up the best dinners you ever ate.

I make the most wonderful baked ham, basted with gingerale and sherry and served with candied yams.

I'm an inspired cook because I love—gosh, how I love to eat!

I USED TO:

Think I'd die if I couldn't go out every night. I believed it was the candid cameramen who took the joy out of night life in Hollywood. Those frightful pictures they take of the best-looking people! Girls chewing, with their mouths open; men looking all but cross-eyed. I was always terrified when they came toward me. I got so nervous I stopped having fun.

Then I began to stay home and was surprised to find I liked it.

I'M FICKLE:

About music. Today I like romantic ballads, yesterday it may have been something fast and snappy, tomorrow it's likely to be a crazy new song or an old lullaby. I love change.

I'VE LEARNED:

From my mother, that you never get anywhere unless you work hard, but you must laugh a lot and have fun on the way.

From a nervous breakdown, how to relax. I'd never been ill in my life when my breakdown came. I was doing "Incendiary Blonde," the story of the life of Texas Guinan. I wanted to do it terribly, was afraid I wouldn't be good, so I worked too hard, forgot about rest. I'd get to the studio at 6 a.m. to have my hair dressed in period styles. I'd stay until 9 or 10 p.m. to have fittings for my period clothes. I'd give up my lunches to rehearse new songs, and I'd work every single Sunday on dance routines. The picture was shooting four months.

I forgot I was only one girl with just my share of strength and endurance. I began to crack and if anyone looked at me, I cried. Before they spoke to me, tears would run down my face. I didn't know what I was crying about, but I couldn't help it.

That taught me you have to take care of your body, treat it right, give it rest, play fair with it, or you can't go on.

From my first day at the races, that I'm no gambler.

I thought I had to bet on every race, whack down a pile on each horse I liked. Then I spent the afternoon worrying myself sick for fear I'd lose, and I lost enough so I couldn't have any fun.

Now, if I attend a race—which I seldom do—I put $2 on each of four horses, spacing them so I can get a kick out of each race. I know I can afford to lose $8, so I bet till my money is gone and then I relax. Sometimes I win, and that's a break—but I always have a good time and no regrets.

I'M FOND OF:

Teddy bears or any soft, stuffed animal that can be squashed up close in my arms;

Sour cream floating on good rich borscht, even sour cream spread on fresh coarse bread;

Good murder mysteries, especially those by Erle Stanley Gardner that make your hair stand up straight on your head and chills do a rhumba up your spine.

I WISH I DIDN'T:

Gain weight. Then I could eat all I wanted of every delicious dish. I like food.

I wish I didn't.

I'D LIKE TO:

Go on a world cruise, after the war, with plenty of time and money.

Go everywhere and miss nothing. I've never been outside this country, and traveling has always been my dream.

Learn to play golf. It sounds fun when golfers talk about it. I never had time to learn to play games.

THE TURNING POINT IN MY LIFE:

Came when Vincent Lopez walked into the Continental night club in Detroit, Michigan, where I was singing. I was 14, going on 15, and I was making lots of noise as usual. He heard my number, said: "That's the girl I want!" And I was in!

THE FIRST THING I NOTICE:

About a man, is how he is dressed. I like immaculate-looking men, who seem just to have stepped out of a shower, freshly shaved, clear eyed.

MY MOST EXCITING MOMENT:

Was the first night of my first Broadway play, "Two For the Show," when I had to take seven curtain calls. Making my first picture took so long and it was so many months before it was released that the edge of excitement had dulled.

But, anyway

I FEEL:

That I haven't yet experienced the high points in a woman's life.

One of these days I want to marry and have a family. I can imagine that falling in love, being engaged and getting married would be the peak moments in any girl's life. Her first baby's birth would be a time of great happiness, too.

But all these things are in the future for me . . . I hope.

MY MOST VIVID EXPERIENCE

Was the birth of my sister's baby. I worried and walked the floor and nearly died until it was over. Then it was a glorious feel-

Army Wife
Wins Writing Success
After 2 Months' Training

"I am an army wife who followed her husband South to his military post. Two months after enrolling for N. I. A. training, I acquired a position as a reporter on the Columbus Enquirer. In four months, I have had two raises. Also I have over 75 'by-lines' to my credit, and the prospects of becoming City Editor look very promising."—Mrs. Marion M. Blondel, Columbus, Georgia.

Why Can't You Write?

It's much simpler than you think!

SO many people with the "germ" of writing in them simply can't get started. They suffer from inertia. Or they set up imaginary barriers to taking the first step.

Many are convinced the field is confined to persons gifted with a genius for writing.

Few realize that the great bulk of commercial writing is done by so-called "unknowns."

Not only do these thousands of men and women produce most of the fiction published, but countless articles on social matters, budgets, household affairs, church activities, human interest stories, war activities, etc., as well.

Such material is in constant demand. Every week thousands of checks for $25, $50 and $100 go out to writers whose latent ability was perhaps no greater than yours.

The Practical Method

Newspaper work demonstrates that the way to learn to write is by writing! Newspaper copy desk editors waste no time on theories or ancient classics. The story is the thing. Every copy "cub" goes through the course of practical criticism—a training that turns out more successful authors than any other experience.

That is why Newspaper Institute of America bases its writing instruction on the Copy Desk Method. It starts and keeps you writing in your own home, on your own time. And upon the very same kind of actual assignments given daily to metropolitan reporters. Thus you learn by doing, not by studying the individual styles of model authors.

Each week your work is analyzed constructively by practical writers. Gradually they help to clarify your own distinctive style. Writing soon becomes easy, absorbing. Profitable, too, as you gain the "professional" touch that gets your material accepted by editors. Above all, you can see constant progress week by week as your faults are corrected and your writing ability grows.

Have You Natural Ability?

Our Writing Aptitude Test will reveal whether or not you have natural talent for writing. It will analyze your powers of observation, your imagination and dramatic instinct. You'll enjoy taking this test. There is no cost or obligation. Simply mail the coupon below, today. Newspaper Institute of America, One Park Avenue, New York 16, N. Y. (Founded 1925) ing to know she was all right, the baby was fine, and life was going on again. But I know that was only the shadow of the way I'll feel when I'm a mother.

I HOPE:

To marry some day.

To love a man who is successful in his own field. He needn't be a great financial success. He might be a doctor, brilliant, with important work to do—but he must be mentally superior to me. I've never had time to cultivate my mind, and I like people who can teach me something. Some men have shallow minds. When you first meet them, they seem clever, but next time they have nothing new to say, and presently they bore you.

To look up to my husband, to have him always a step ahead.

To have at least two children, a boy and a girl.

I ADMIRE

Claudette Colbert, because she represents the kind of woman I'd like to be.

Director George Stevens. He's at war now, but I hope some day he'll direct me in a picture. His little touches slay me!

Honesty.

I ENJOY:

That drive from Hollywood to Arrowhead, when orange blossoms are in bloom.

Firelight in good company.

I USED TO:

Act on the spur of the moment. I'd get mad, rush to the front office and rave. That was bad. The front office wasn't mad, but calm and able to outthink me fifty ways.

NOW:

I wait till I'm calm, then go in casually and discuss the matter. It works.

I BELIEVE:

In luck, but that's because I'm a fatalist.

I never got anything by going after it. What I have always came to me. It just happened, with no effort on my part, that Lopez dropped in at that Continental that night; it just happened that I called on Buddy de Silva's lawyer about a law suit. He saw me and thought I'd be good for a part Buddy had open. I've never even had to take a screen test!

I can struggle and strain but I'll get nowhere. If it's for me, it comes.

I FEEL:

That I'm not yet a complete person, that I'll never be complete until I have become a wife and mother.

I'D HATE TO THINK:

I'd fall down in these two most important parts, and

I HOPE AND PRAY:

I'll be a success in both roles.

Are You in the Know?

If you were this junior hostess, would you say—
☐ "I hate games"
☐ "Let's join in"
☐ "I'd rather watch"

Everybody on the floor for a mixer! (Just when you're snaring that handsome Marine!) But a successful USO hostess forgets about herself—lets her guests have the fun. So you join in. At certain times, forgetting about yourself is easy when you trust your secret to Kotex. It's Kotex that has those patented ends—pressed flat—not thick, nor stubby. That's one important reason why Kotex is different from ordinary napkins. Skylark through a "calendar" evening, confidently. No outlines show . . . with Kotex sanitary napkins!

If this happens to you, should you blame—
☐ Your waxed floors
☐ Your scatter rugs
☐ Yourself

Tain't funny when falls cause 15,750 casualties a year! If your scatter rugs slip—blame yourself. Anchor them with rug cushions. And for safety's sake on difficult days, why not choose the only napkin with the 4-ply safety center . . . choose Kotex . . . and get plus protection? You'll like the dependable softness of Kotex. Unlike other pads, Kotex does more than just "feel" soft at first touch. Kotex stays soft while wearing—keeps its shape, keeps you more comfortable—longer!

Which do you need, for this "trim" effect?
☐ Scraps of felt
☐ Two weeks' allowance
☐ A milliner

You can do it yourself! Just cut out simple flower shapes from scraps of felt . . . tack 'em with snappers to your gloves and beanie. Vary the flower colors, and have matching accessories for every outfit! They go together. Like daintiness and smooth grooming. Like Quest and Kotex. For Quest Powder, the Kotex deodorant, answers the urgent need for a powder deodorant on "those" days. Used with sanitary napkins, safe, unscented Quest Powder banishes fear of offending.

More women choose KOTEX* than all other napkins put together

I was ashamed to ask other women-

these intimate physical facts!

"THERE was so much about intimate feminine hygiene I wanted to know but didn't. And I was ashamed to let other women find out how ignorant I was.

How glad I am now I didn't ask them because I've learned since so many women know only "half-truths"—old-fashioned misinformation.

Instead I went to my Doctor. He told me about a newer, modern, scientific method of douching with Zonite — the discovery of a world-famous surgeon and renowned chemist. He explained how feminine hygiene is so important to a woman's charm, beauty and health. And how Zonite helps solve one of woman's most serious deodorant problems."

Smart Women No Longer Use Weak Or Harmful Preparations—

Old-fashioned mixtures of soap, soda or vinegar DO NOT and CAN NOT give the germicidal, deodorant action of Zonite.

On the other hand don't use old-time overstrong solutions of harmful poisons which can actually burn, severely irritate and damage tissues—in time may even impair functional activity of the mucous glands. With modern Zonite you take no such risky chance.

So Powerful Yet So Harmless

No other type of liquid antiseptic-germicide for the douche of all those tested is SO POWERFUL yet SO SAFE to delicate tissues as Zonite.

Zonite actually destroys odor. It instantly kills all germs and bacteria it touches. Of course due to anatomical barriers it's not always possible to contact all germs and bacteria in the tract. BUT YOU CAN BE SURE OF THIS! No other germicide kills germs any faster or more thoroughly than Zonite! Zonite kills every reachable germ and keeps them from multiplying.

Yet Zonite is so harmless. POSITIVELY non-poisonous, non-caustic, non-burning. Use Zonite as often as needed without the slightest danger. Follow directions.

WORDS OF MUSIC

It has been rumored that Miller and his Army band will continue to play for the troops in different theatres of war for the duration. But Glenn is one bandleader whose long absence from the nation's ballrooms hasn't hurt his popularity one bit. When the war is over, I look for him to step right back into his top place among the name outfits.

Here's another V-Mail—from Martha Tilton, who went to the South Pacific with Jack Benny, Carole Landis and Larry Adler.

"Dear Jill:

"Believe it or not, I am writing this about umpteen thousand feet in the air on Larry Adler's typewriter, which you can see by all the mistakes I'm making, I can't use very well. We've had a wonderful trip so far, and everywhere we've gone the boys have liked our show. Jack Benny wows them, and of course they go for Carole in a big way. I don't have to tell you that Larry stops the show. He plays encore after encore. Although I have been singing mostly new songs, I was very surprised and thrilled to have the boys request a lot of the numbers that I recorded with Benny Goodman a few years ago.

"We stopped at Hawaii on our way out here and it is everything they ever said about it. Really beautiful. The Special Service officers were wonderful to us and showed us a lot of the place in a short time. I wish I could give you more news about everything, but the censors are very strict out this way. I'll have a lot to tell you when I get home.

"Jill, I can't tell you the sensation of flying over such large expanses of water. I can't say I am frightened, because I'm not—but it certainly is different than flying from Los Angeles to San Francisco.

"Please excuse all the question marks where the commas should be, but I'm not much of a typist, especially in an airplane. I have a sneaking hunch we won't get a P.O. address, the way we are hopping around, or I would make you answer this. No more time now because we are landing soon. Please give my love to everyone I know whom you know.

Your world-traveling girl friend,
Martha."

From Spike Jones, who took his "City Slickers" and his collection of cow bells, washboards, bird whistles and ratchets overseas, comes this note:

"Dear Jill:

"Well, here we are in England. London has been our headquarters, but we have been all around the country and to Scotland. So far we have been restricted to playing hospitals and I am very glad because, with our small band, we can cover every ward in each place. A few times we have been present during mail call and, believe me, it is something to see the faces on the boys when they receive news from home.

"I was so excited when I left that I completely forgot to bring any instrument oil for the horns, and none of the musicians remembered it either. However, the resourceful Army came to the rescue and we discovered that jeep oil worked fine. Incidentally, we have added peep and jeep horns to our "musical" collection, which makes us louder at least. And our washboards have come in plenty handy. We have been living in pup tents and doing all our own laundry.

"I am now firmly convinced that it is a small world. Our vocalists, the Nilsson Twins, located their brother, Jack, who is a P.F.C. attached to a public relations unit just outside of London, and he was able to spend a couple of days with us. He has been over here three years, and the twins had grown up so much since he left home that he hardly recognized them. It was a great reunion.

"Well, Jill, I guess I had better close, because we are leaving in a few minutes and I want to get this off in the mail. I have a lot of interesting things to tell you, but I'll have to save them until I get home. See you sometime in October. Say hello to everybody on Vine Street for me.

Sincerely,
(Signed) Spike."

When Bing Crosby went to the South Pacific to sing for the G.I.'s, he broke a fourteen-year old promise to himself. When his close friend, Knute Rockne, was killed in a crash in 1930, Bing vowed he would never fly again. But he has long wanted to go overseas and the only way he could do it was by plane.

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC:

Capitol:

The King Cole Trio have a swell new coupling in "Gee, Baby, Ain't I Good To You" and "I Realize Now." Nat Cole sings both vocals. Keep an eye on this trio—they're going places.

Eddie Miller and his orchestra have recorded "Stomp, Mr. Henry Lee" and "Yesterdays." Eddie's tenor saxophone and Stan Wrightsman's fine piano work are featured on the "Stomp" side. On "Yesterdays," the old Jerome Kern song, there is some good clarinet by Matty Matlock. This record was made a few months ago, before Eddie went into the Army. (He recently received a medical discharge and has returned to Hollywood.)

Andy Russell, whose records of "Amor" and "Besame Mucho" were big sellers, has a new offering, "What A Difference A Day Made" and "Don't You Notice Anything New?" with Paul Weston's orchestra.

Paul Weston's band also backs up the Pied Pipers on "The Trolley Song" and "Cuddle Up A Little Closer." The "Trolley" thing is the cute number from Judy Garland's new picture, "Meet Me In St. Louis.' Jo Stafford is the feminine voice with the Pipers on this platter. It was recorded before she decided to concentrate on solo work.

Decca:

Dick Haymes and Helen Forrest have recorded "It Had To Be You" and "Together" as a duet with Victor Young's orchestra.

Jimmy Dorsey and the band are in for two new ballads, "An Hour Never Passes," sung by Gladys Tell, and "Two Again" with Paul Carley on the vocal. Gladys has since left the band to get married and Anita Boyer has taken her place.

band are also in the ballad department this month with "Don't Take Your Love From Me" and "Forget-Me-Nots In Your Eyes." Eugenie Baird sings both sides.

Guy Lombardo and the Royal Canadians do "Together" and "Come With Me My Honey" in typical Lombardo style, with Tony Craig on the vocals. "Come With Me" is the song of Calypso Joe, written by the writers of "Love, Love, Love."

Tiny Hill is a new name on the Decca label. The three hundred and fifty pound band leader and his orchestra offer "How Many Hearts Have You Broken" (With Those Great Big Beautiful Eyes) and "Rose of Santa Rosa." Since leaving the "All-Time Hit Parade" show, Tiny has been on tour in the Middle West.

Hildegarde's new release is "Lili Marlene" and "My Heart Sings," with Harry Sosnik's orchestra. "Lili Marlene" is the most popular of all the war songs with the Allied fighting men. It was originally a German song, but was picked up by the Allied troops and has been used as a marching song all over the world. "My Heart Sings" is an English adaptation of a French love song.

Bing Crosby and the Sisters Andrews have joined forces for two solid sides: "Is You Is Or Is You Ain't Ma' Baby" and "There'll Be A Hot Time In the Town of Berlin," with Vic Schoen's orchestra and arrangements. "Hot Time" was written by Sgt. Joe Bushkin, now with the "Winged Victory" show and formerly Tommy Dorsey's pianist.

Columbia:

Here's an old Will Bradley recording, made before the Petrillo trouble, and featuring Ray McKinley. It's "Fry Me Cookie, With A Can Of Lard" and "Request For A Rhumba." Ray, of course, is now drumming away with Capt. Glenn Miller's Army Band.

Another pre-Petrillo platter is Ginny Simms' "I'm Glad There Is You" and "Chinese Lullaby," with a full orchestra background.

Victor:

Here's "Lili Marlene" again, this time by Perry Como, with "First Class Private Mary Brown" on the reverse side. The Victor company, like Columbia, is still unable to record with a live orchestra, so Perry once again is backed up with a vocal chorus. The "Mary Brown" tune has received WAC approval in their recruiting campaign. It was written by P.F.C. Frank Loesser, composer of "Praise The Lord And Pass The Ammunition" and "What Do You Do In The Infantry?"

"Don't Blame Me," a hit of a few years ago, is being rivived again, so Victor has re-issued Shep Field's old record of it. On the reverse side is "Dance With A Dolly" by Tony Pastor and his orchestra, with Tony doing the singing.

Another re-issue is Artie Shaw's "Don't Take Your Love From Me," with fine vocal work by Lena Horne, and "It Had To Be You," which is done as a swing instrumental.

Vaughn Monroe and his orchestra have two tunes which were recorded B.P.B. (before Petrillo ban): "Hawaiian Sunset," with Vaughn on the vocal, and "Take It, Jackson."

phonist with Duke Ellington, is featured on a tune called "Passion Flower," with "Going Out The Back Way" on the flipover. The band is composed mostly of Ellington men.

Before Dinah Shore took off for her G.I. jaunt overseas, she waxed two sides with a vocal chorus, "Together" and "I Learned A Lesson I'll Never Forget." I'll bet singing in person for all the thousands of boys she has sung to over "Mail Call," "Command Performance" programs will give Dinah a thrill she'll never forget.

Victor recently signed David Street, the romantic baritone on the Joan Davis air show, to an exclusive recording contract. Martha Stewart, former Claude Thornhill thrush, is another who landed a Victor deal.

Jam Notes:

Trumpet-playing Billie Rogers, who worked with a small combination when she left Woody Herman, has formed her own large band and has been playing around New York. Her husband, Jack Archer, formerly road manager for Herman, is managing Billie's outfit.

Gene Krupa's new twenty-six piece band boasts eleven strings, and an extra drummer. Gene is handling the baton and only beats the skins on solo numbers. The band has been signed by R.K.O. for a spot in "George White's Scandals." And when Gene comes to Hollywood for the picture, he and his divorced wife, Ethel, may remarry.

Though previously announced, Stan Kenton and his orchestra won't appear in Paramount's "Duffy's Tavern." When the script was finished, Paramount decided they didn't want a band in the picture, after all, and Stan was paid off. The same thing happened to Les Brown after he was all set for "Bring On The Girls."

After a year of retirement, Marilyn Duke has rejoined her old boss, Vaughn Monroe . . . Artie Shaw and his wife, Betty, daughter of Jerome Kern, have separated and are planning a divorce . . . Ella Mae Morse and her husband, Dick Walters, are also divorcing . . . Hal McIntyre has had all of his arrangements microfilmed, processed the same as V-Mail, in the event he ever loses his library.

Benny Goodman is doing guest shots on New York radio shows and still insists he will not reorganize his band until his contract with the Music Corporation of America has run out. . . .

Andy Russell's crooner stock is rising. He took over Bob Crosby's singing chores on the Old Gold show, when Bob went into the Marine Corps, and was such a click the sponsors signed him to a long-term contract. The show now originates from New York, so Andy will probably play an engagement at one of the big clubs there . . . Orson Welles was gifted with a beautiful gold cigarette lighter by his number one fan, Frank Sinatra . . . After the Tommy Dorsey-Jon Hall fracas, Al Jarvis, on his popular Hollywood disc program, dedicated "Swingin' on a Star" to Tommy.

So long for now playmates. Remember, if you want to be smoothed out on any little musical things, just drop me a line and enclose a self-addressed envelope, and I'll do my best to give you the dope. I'll plant you now, but I'll dig you right back here next month. Oh yes, the address: Jill Warren, Movieland Magazine, 9126 Sunset Blvd., Los Angeles 46, Calif.

coming two months ahead of time that he asked for an emergency furlough. I knew nothing about his arrival until the nurse wakened me at two one morning to say I had a visitor. Before I could protest against having a caller at that hour, my husband walked into the room.

"We had five wonderful days. The nurses were grand. When the floor nurse made her rounds after visiting hours—which was nine p.m.—she would keep mum while Oli hid in the closet. She held back her chuckles, while I held my breath, as Oli tiptoed down the hall at one a.m., the squeak of his cavalry boots getting fainter as he neared the stairway."

How Gene left the little cottage in the village near the army post, where she had been keeping house for her husband, to be near her mother and sister in Washington, D. C., when her baby came, has already been told.

"With hospital beds overflowing into the halls, I was lucky to get a room on such short notice," Gene said. "But I wasn't permitted to stay long. Eight days after my baby was born, I was told that I would have to leave. My baby, of course, would remain in the hospital in the incubator for another two months.

"Although my doctor ordered me to stay in bed for six weeks, getting a nurse was out of the question. Mother and my little seventeen-year-old sister, Patricia, were wonderful. They took wonderful care of Daria and me, and did everything possible to make me comfortable. But they couldn't do anything about the food that was being sent up from the hotel dining room. Which was terrible.

"After a week of it, an officer who was a friend of the family, suggested they take me out where I could get something decent to eat. He carried me to the taxi. I had a gay time in a famous restaurant, in one of the best hotels in the capital. Not until I was eating my dessert did I realize how exhausted I was. It was then that my officer friend picked me up, chair and all, and carried me through the hotel lobby out to the taxi. We caused a lot of laughs when the hotel manager came running after us calling, 'Where are you going with that chair?'

"After two weeks, I was up for dinner every night. A month later, I received a request to leave on a bond selling tour. What's more, I went—although I really hadn't the strength to spare, I'm afraid.

"The day I returned to Washington, Mother and I started a search for an apartment for me. But the day before my baby was scheduled to leave the hospital, we had found nothing. I was desperate. I couldn't take my little girl into that small hotel room I was occupying.

"It was then I realized I would go to almost any lengths for my child. I even thought of calling the President!

"On second thought, I decided that would be a little thick. But I did call Mr. Morgenthau's office. I explained to his secretary that I was one of Mr. Morgenthau's bond saleswomen. That I was in desperate need of an apartment for myself and my baby. I pointed out the fact that I hadn't hesi-tated to come to their aid when they needed me.

"And not fifteen minutes later, I had a message that an apartment at such and such an address would be ready for me the following day. Oh, I was so grateful!"

Then, apologizing for having been too selfishly personal in telling about her baby, Gene summed up the message she was meaning to deliver to all the thousands of other young war wives, saying, "It's terrifically important, I think, for a young wife to have a baby when her husband is going into the armed service. The baby is a constant reminder of her husband. She will have little time to get lonesome, caring for her child.

"Many drastic changes take place in your life, when a baby comes into it.

"For instance when Oli and I bought our house in an isolated Southern California canyon, we reveled in the fact that we were miles off the main road. When I came back here, I realized that in spite of our beautiful, comfortable home, it was too far away from doctors and stores. I felt lucky, then, to find a modest cottage in town. That the location was in a section that at one time I would not have liked as well as our canyon home was no longer important.

"Having a baby gives you a different perspective, too, on your own childhood. I look back on mine now with more understanding and appreciation. I realize how wise and kind my mother was. I only hope that I can give my little girl as happy a girlhood as I have had.

"And I hope I'll never forget that I, too, was once a little girl. That's most important, I think—to remember that a child can be hurt and embarrassed as deeply as an adult.

"I will never forget the time when I stole into my mother's room while she was entertaining a caller at tea and took her new hat out of the box. I can see myself now, as I preened in front of the mirror. With its wide brim and big red rose, I was sure it was the most beautiful hat!

"I was so absorbed in my reflection that when Mother called me I hurried downstairs before I realized that I was still wearing her hat.

"But you'd have thought Mother was used to seeing her child appear balancing her new hats on her head. 'This is my daughter, Gene,' she said without a flicker of an eyelash. Painfully aware of the hat, I was embarrassed to death. I hurried from the room as soon as possible, blessing Mother to this day for her tactfulness.

"I hope I will have as much courage and good sense as Mother had when Father fought in World War I and she found herself home alone with a new baby—my brother, Howard, whom my father had never seen. As I sit talking to my little Daria about her daddy, I can't help thinking how history is repeating itself.

"I think, though, that it is vitally important for any child to have a sister and brother. The give and take of family life, the exchange of ideas, the companionship that I had, were priceless.

"I will feel our family is complete only when Oleg is back home to stay and there are a few more children in our home."

TALE OF A TOWN

old Jeston Johnson house, built in 1883, and converted it into a lodge. They supplied Hollywood studios with a catalogue of every beard and blonde, every horse, cow, mule, buckboard, covered wagon, buggy, ranch-house, scenic wonder and other assets in four counties. They invited studio location managers to look the situation over.

Kanab has definite disadvantages. It is 133 miles from the nearest railroad, 100 miles from the nearest telegraph office, and the great vermilion cliffs interfere with radio reception. And 1931 was a year of dark depression.

But the town's co-operativeness, the Parry Bros.' fine management and the country's spectacular beauties caused the project to gain such headway that today a studio has to plan almost a year or a year and a half in advance to make reservations in Kanab.

In the year 1943, five pictures were made there. 20th Century-Fox alone spent $101,000 on the Parry Bros.' transportation facilities, besides a lodging and board bill for some 200 people for that box-office breaker, "Buffalo Bill."

In 1944, 20th Century-Fox sent the company of "Thunderhead," starring Roddy MacDowell, Preston Foster and Rita Johnson, to spend many weeks there shooting in Technicolor.

To the Parry Bros., who are the only capital investors in the project, their expenditure of approximately $90,000 on the lodge, $70,000 on cars, wagons and camping equipment, pays off neatly. On the "Buffalo Bill" trek, they netted about $30,000 in one month.

Chaunce's death in 1943 left only Whit and Gron to carry on the business. But the whole town benefits by the studio activities.

Sheriff George Swapp doubles as camp cook for stars, technicians, crew and extras outside the village. Mayor Verne Lindquist chauffeurs the station wagon assigned to movie directors. The City Councilmen work as horse-wranglers. Ranchers get the best available help because hands know they'll have an opportunity to earn movie money, too. Ranchers themselves don greasepaint or build sets.

Girls of the domestic science classes work in the kitchen or dining room of the lodge, while the boys of the manual arts classes get practical experience keeping up the vast amount of equipment maintained by Parry Bros. for the motion picture companies.

And when the lodge overflows, the townspeople double up to free enough homes for the use of the Hollywood visitors.

H. Ackerman, proprietor of Kanab's general store, sums up the benefits thustly: "Most ranchers raise cattle to pay their mortgages. They have to sell part of their assets to do so. But with our ranchers, the movie folks borrow our assets awhile, then we have money to pay off the mortgage and still we have our original assets. Postmaster Ford sells fifty times the normal amount of war bonds and stamps for a town this size. Boys and girls earn money for better clothes and for their college education. The women buy household equipment they couldn't dream of owning otherwise. We earn as much, if not more, from the movies as we do from our usual work and other commodities.

"And," he emphasizes, "the movies go away advertising us to the whole world. Why, not long ago a hermit living out on Green River came stomping into my store to find the way to Zion National Park. He'd lived out there on the river all his 71 years. Cantankerous, too. Never wanted to look around. But one morning a party of tourists, exploring the river by boat, stopped at his cabin asking the way to the canyon.

"Turned out they came all the way from London, England, because a Technicolor picture made them want to see this country first-hand."

Another Kanabite pointed to Nurse Viola Mich'l, who was at the moment administering a salt-tablet to Roddy MacDowell, on the location in magnificent Kaibab Forest.

"Movies bring our kids back here to live," the oldtimer remarked. "Viola Adams, there, went to New York City and had a fine job in one of the city's biggest hospitals. Met and Married this Mich'l fellow, who was a taxidermist and field man for the New York Museum of Natural History. Both of them doing well. Viola got homesick, but she liked the excitement of New York and its opportunities.

"Well, they came here on a visit with her folks. The movie people were here. Makes our town different from most country towns. And the upshot of it was, they decided to stay. He gets special orders from museums all over the country. And she nurses movie stars as well as kids with hives. Might get to take Clark Gable's pulse some day. You never know, here in Kanab, who you might meet."

Are the stars bored by this small-town atmosphere? Not so you'd notice! Joel McCrea, Maureen O'Hara and Linda Darnell loudly advertise Mr. and Mrs. Faye Hamblin's wonderful venison dinners. Faye kills the venison himself and keeps it in cold-storage until summer guests arrive. An invitation from them is prized by anyone.

Roddy MacDowell listens avidly to 76-year-old Walt Hamblin, son of the town's founder, tell about the early days when Indians stormed their home. About the days when Buffalo Bill Cody brought a party of titled Englishmen for a fabulous hunting party and Walt guided them. Walt was to have joined Buffalo Bill's show when it went to Europe, but had an accident and missed the chance. About that time, too, Teddy Roosevelt had Walt as a guide on a hunting party. Walt Hamblin likes this acting business. He gets up and acts it all out. Has photographs to prove many of his stories, too.

Preston Foster, John Wayne, Roy Rogers and other stout male stars plan hunting trips for deer, lions and other game, all so plentiful at Kanab.

All of them long for an invitation to see the inside of one of the old Mormon homes built during the polygamous days. They all join in the village's twice-weekly dances, where small children dance right along with their parents.

They all enjoy visiting "Little Hollywood."

THE AWFUL TRUTH

for neither their backgrounds, their temperaments, nor their emotional and psychological structures can be brought to dovetail sufficiently for a sturdy and lasting marriage.

Love between a man and woman is over-rated as a miracle worker. Undoubtedly, both Barbara and Cary thought it would build bridges between her world and his—make each one accessible to the inner being and resources of the other.

It didn't work that way. Their love for each other when they married cannot be questioned. For two years they'd been seeing each other constantly. Because Barbara wanted to make charitable bequests which would have been impossible if she were the wife of a British subject, as Cary was then, they both served an apprenticeship to love. They wanted the marriage so eagerly, so absorbedly, that it's doubtful whether they stopped to analyze their own temperaments, and the insoluble differences between them which would become apparent with marriage.

To understand this separation, and to evaluate it properly, it is well to remember what had been their individual experiences which would make marriage adjustment problematical.

Barbara was singularly alone from childhood. Her mother died at her birth, and her early years were a succession of governesses and private schools. Physically, she had the care of a princess. She had everything money could buy—but nothing which has no price.

As she grew older, her emotional isolation grew apace. Unconsciously, she began to search and reach for something, someone to rescue her from the Ivory Tower where she was so frighteningly lonely.

Prince Alexis Mdivani had great regard for a fortune counted in millions, even if the heiress went with them. He married Barbara in Paris, shortly before she came into her inheritance, after following her halfway around the world to lay calculated siege to her bank-book.

Perhaps if this first time Barbara had married a man who truly loved her, to whom her wealth was merely an impediment, one is inclined to think that today she would not be known as the "tragic heiress."

For then Barbara would have matured in the confident knowledge that she was loved as a woman.

It wasn't long before Barbara knew why Alexis had married her. Almost immediately afterward he is said to have remarked, coldly, bluntly, cruelly: "You are too fat."

The dagger sunk deep. The hurt he inflicted remained in her consciousness from then on.

It was then she began the self-imposed regime of starvation which almost cost her her life when her son Lance was born. For a year she virtually lived on black coffee. But at the end of that year she was no longer plump and strong. She weighed less than a hundred pounds. But in the process, she had become strangely beautiful, with an ethereal, exotic loveliness which later was to intrigue and enthrall Cary Grant, to whom exquisite women were no novelty.

BACKACHE, LEG PAINS MAY BE DANGER SIGN Of Tired Kidneys

If backache and leg pains are making you miserable, don't just complain and do nothing about them. Nature may be warning you that your kidneys need attention.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

• Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

At this time began that lack of proper self-evaluation as a woman which was to haunt Barbara Hutton for the rest of her life. In self-defense she acquired a reserve, a dignity, a withdrawal from people, which was later to be labeled callousness towards public opinion. By nature Barbara is warm. By circumstance she had been forced to be the contrary.

The second phase of her development, as a result of this first marriage, began now. And that phase was also to reverberate through her second marriage and in her marriage to Cary.

If Barbara, shortly after coming into her millions, could have retired from the public view, it would have served her well.

Unfortunately, Alexis was a publicity hound. He thought that being in the newspapers, day after day, with the central theme the spending of vast sums, was a barometer of his importance.

The American public resented Barbara and her Prince and her millions. Whenever her name was spoken, it was in derision. Whenever reporters had a chance to take a crack at her, they did. She lived under a barrage of criticism.

It made her afraid of crowds, of people. It added to her psychic scars.

So now you have two deeply developed traits, which were to become part of the dowry she brought to any man she loved—a self-abnegation, a mistrust of herself as a woman, and a deeply-rooted fear of contact with the world at large.

Instead of maturing with marriage, she became less mature. For maturity implies coordination of the personality, an ability to take whatever comes, in criticism and disappointment, standing up. Instead, she began to seek escape in anonymity. She developed a dislike of large parties which became virtually a phobia. She became sensitive. She was hurt easily.

After she divorced the Prince—with the attendant publicized financial settlements—and married Count Kurt Haugwitz-Reventlow, the process was briefly arrested and she bloomed, because she thought herself a woman beloved. But then the process continued. Again she was dominated and made to feel unwanted.

She gave up her American citizenship on the advice of her husband. For love, she became a woman without a country.

But she had her son now. And for the first time in her life she had a great and a sure and satisfying love. When she divorced the Count in 1941, she did not anticipate the round of court struggles for his custody which is even now a current chapter in her confused life.

So here we have a girl—wealthy, sensitive, afraid of people, suspicious of their motives, quiet and passive with few intellectual interests, with distrust in her heart towards men who profess to love her. A girl with not too much physical stamina. A girl afraid.

And this was the girl Cary Grant met fleetingly in London, and again two years later at a Hollywood party given by the Countess di Frasso.

From the instant their eyes met, they both had a sense of coming home—of reaching port. Cary had never wholly ceased loving Virginia Cherrill, to whom he had been married briefly. She was the melody which repeated itself in his heart.

For approximately five years he had never quite reached the point of marriage with the three or four women to whom he was linked romantically. But when he looked at Barbara, one melody was finally stilled and another began.

Barbara was so gentle. Barbara was so vulnerable. Barbara was so evidently unhappy. Barbara was so poignantly sweet. She was different from any woman Cary had ever known. Everything that was protective and strong and solid and good in Cary responded, instantly and completely.

But what Barbara needed for happiness, Cary needed too! And they couldn't give it to each other.

Like every creative artist, he requires deep understanding, almost compassion, during those dark, depressed moods when he worries about his work and his worth.

He requires someone to listen to his troubles, to give him a sense of perspective, to help him achieve mental and emotional balance.

Only a completely adjusted woman—positive, sure of herself, serene—can give these things to a man.

Cary is not an intellectual, in the accepted sense, but he has a keen mind — it sparkles and scintillates — and he loves to argue about problems and situations. He seasons his comments with pungent humor, and it takes an alert, gay, vital woman to keep pace with him.

In view of the tribulations which had beset Barbara all her life, a vivid wit, sparkling repartee, the give-and-take of lusty argument was not constantly within her capacity.

There is a very great simplicity about Cary. Some years ago when he bought a Cord, he sold it within three days because he felt too ostentatious driving it. When he owned a haberdashery on Wilshire Boulevard, which he bought to help out a friend, he spent all his spare moments standing behind a counter and waiting on trade. His idea of a wonderful time is to go to Venice Pier, the California Coney Island, and systematically patronize every concession.

Barbara, conversely, is accustomed to pomp and glory and orderliness. She may follow an impulse to buy a castle, but not to roast weenies over a beach fire in the middle of the night.

Cary can neither be dominated nor driven. But because Barbara herself has been dominated, she is inclined in self-defense to be a bit too dominating, a bit too possessive. And no man can be held or made happy with a tight rein.

With a person as carefree as Cary, words are frequently not as scrupulously measured as they might be, even though he is thoughtful and kind. And probably Barbara was too easily hurt, for she was always expecting to be hurt.

So here you have two diverse temperaments, two diverse backgrounds—and both needing something the other couldn't give.

In such instances, no matter how auspiciously a marriage might have begun, it is doomed before the last I do's are said.

When Cary marries again—as he will—he will marry a woman not too deeply hurt by life. A woman with a sense of humor. A woman who can laugh at Cary, laugh with him, and laugh at herself!

a father. On my part, there was no theatrical tradition in the family. The idea of being an actress had somehow never occurred to me. I was going to be an artist—and if I may say so, in all modesty, I still am pretty good at a drawing board, and frequently amuse myself by sketching people between scenes on the sets at Paramount.

We don't even look much alike, you and I, except that we're both dark. Mutual friends have told me we are alike in temperament and personality, however. And I know we had another bond in common: we both worshipped our fathers (mine is still living with me, fortunately) and turned to them for everything. And we both were an ancient eighteen when we made our film debuts. (Yours was a bit part in "Kismet," I believe, with your father as the star, while mine was even less of a role, in "Henry Aldrich Gets Glamour.")

The first time we met was on the set of "The Uninvited," remember? And I don't mind confessing that I was mighty impressed that first day you walked on the set and started your rehearsal for a scene. You were a great name to me, of course—but what I remember most was your reaction on others. Usually, during a rehearsal, there is a certain amount of banging and noise by the carpenters and electricians and other actors, but once you started to speak there was a sudden and complete silence. Everyone was looking at you and listening to you.

"Some day," I said to myself, "I hope to be an actress who commands that kind of silence and respect!" Believe, Miss Skinner, I mean to try.

But did you ever play a role of a living person? If so, you must know what a funny feeling it gives you, and why I was a little uneasy all the time we were making "Our Hearts." Mostly I was afraid I wouldn't do you justice, and that unconsciously I might saddle the screen "you" with some of the bad habits of the real me.

For instance, I know I have the very bad habit of walking with my head down. Every once in a while, therefore, I would jerk myself up and wonder, "Gosh, did I have my head down in that last scene? Miss Skinner would never be guilty of that."

Or maybe it was the way I was wearing the clothes, or the way I was dancing, or the way I played the young love scenes. Would you like it? Would you approve of the "you" I was creating for public inspection? Believe me, it was a responsibility!

There were lots of scenes, however, when I felt a very close identity with the girl you were when you were my own age and made your famous jaunt to "see Frenchmen!" The time, the place and the people were different, but so many of your experiences paralleled things that have happened to me.

Remember the scene at the beginning when you were stuck with a mousy-faced, sawed-off little guy at the Prom, while the tall and handsome man of your dreams waltzed by with another girl? How well I knew your sense of disgust and frustration! Not so very long ago, you see, I was in the same boat. A girlfriend persuaded me to go on a double-date to a high school dance with a blind date provided for me by her escort. I'm fairly tall, like you, so you can imagine how my heart sank when the blind date turned out to be a little shrimp who barely came up to my shoulders! And there I was, stuck with him for the whole evening!

And then the famous trip to Europe itself. Maybe 1925 and 1944 aren't such different eras, after all. At any rate fantastic things apparently still happen to two young ladies who a-traveling go. When "The Uninvited" was finished, I was very tired and the studio gave me a lovely trip to the Camel Back Inn in Phoenix, Ariz., and let me take my very good friend, Carmelita Lopez, with me. We were both terribly excited, for it was the first time either of us had done any traveling on our own, and like you and Emily, we were confident we were entirely capable of handling any and all emergencies. Women of the world, that was us, with savoir faire to burn!

Tipping proved to be our first stumbling block. Neither of us knew how much it was correct to tip the porter or the waiter, or if you tipped the conductor, and if so, how much.

"Whatever we do, we don't want to look cheap!" I insisted. "Remember some day all these people may know me and remember how I acted on this train. Think of my reputation!"

"Sure," Carmelita said. "But how much is that reputation in dollars and cents?"

Eventually we decided on thirty-five percent. It seemed a good round figure, neither ostentatious (horrors, never that!) nor cheap. I must say the service was good.

To Phoenix from Los Angeles is an overnight jump, and both Carmelita and I were so excited that sleep was impossible. So we piled our pillows along the window sill, propped ourselves up on our elbows, and stared continuously at the landscape as it whizzed by. Take a chance on missing anything? Not us!

Eventually we were startled by a loud rapping in our faces. Early in the morning we had fallen asleep, still propped up at the windows with our noses plastered against the panes. The train was in a station, and the rapping was a reveille sounded on the windows by a dozen amused soldiers from a troop train on the opposite track! Alas, for our savoir faire!

But of all the times when I felt a close identity with you, Miss Skinner, the most real was the scene where you wheedle permission from your father for the trip to Europe, before broaching the subject to your mother. It was my own system! I always went to Papa first where money or a special favor was concerned. And like your father, he always seemed to understand.

The best fun in making "Our Hearts" undoubtedly came in the dance scenes when the girls'—yours and Emily's—"safety bags" kept bumping against their partners. It was a funny scene and fun to do; all of us laughed so much we were weak around the ribs. Several times the bags dropped off during the shooting, and Diana and I would have to scurry off behind some scenery to get them fastened on again. By the time it was over we were as much concerned about keeping them on as you and Emily were about getting them off!

Incidentally, I unwittingly took my "safety bag" with me to New York on my recent trip. When we were leaving here my dramatic coach, Bill Russell, handed me a beautifully wrapped present with instructions not to open it until I reached New York. Naturally, being a female, I opened it ten minutes after we left the station. And guess what—the "safety bag" I had worn with such hilarious results in the picture. Pinned to it was a note reading: "Don't forget to use this in the big city!"

The hardest thing both Diana and I had to learn for "Our Hearts" was the "debutante slouch" and the peculiar walk that apparently were hot stuff back in 1923. How we had to practice them! And what a riot we caused the day we made our entrance, complete with those bubblebath coats of white rabbit, into the commissary one noon!

"Shades of Clara Bow!" someone called, and everyone laughed. It was funny, of course—but in another way it struck me as being a little sad, too. After all, Clara Bow was once the top star of that same studio, and I couldn't help but wonder if the memory of us on the screen today will bring the same kind of laughter, twenty years from now.

What scared me most was the clothes and the hair-dos. They weren't the most becoming lines for a girl, you will admit—and I was afraid to look unattractive while I was still an unknown little actress, far from established on the screen, with only two pictures to my credit. I've always been self-conscious about my "derriere" anyway, and those dresses with waistlines around the knees certainly do nothing for a girl's hips. How could you stand them?

If you are pleased with the way I have played you, dear Miss Skinner, and if you feel I have done justice to the charming girl you were and the unforgettable adventure you had, then I shall forgive you those dresses and what they did to my hipline. And greater charity than that no woman can show to another!

Seriously, it is I who am in your debt and always shall be. Playing you in "Our Hearts Were Young And Gay" has brought me your friendship, as you proved with that treasured gift of a small silver compact. Playing you saved me from being typed in heavy drama as the ghost-ridden girl I was in "The Uninvited," and am again in my new picture, "Her Heart In Her Throat." (A suspense story about a governess—me—who gets mixed up in three murders.) It proved to me I could do something I didn't think I could do—comedy. And it has helped me overcome a tendency to be moody and depressed, because working in a light and gay picture, you learn to be relaxed and kid with the rest of the crew.

So as I add it up, it is a great debt. And yet there is one more thing I want to ask of you. Remember that copy of "Our Hearts Were Young And Gay" which I sent you? On the fly leaf I wrote: "Hope you break down some day and tell us what really happened in Paris!"

I'm still waiting. Come on, Miss Skinner, and tell.

Yours, with great admiration,
Gail (Your Alter Ego) Russell.

ANGELA LANSBURY

innumerable curtain calls, the glow of enthusiastic applause. Important people like Sir Gerald duMaurier made a great fuss of the blonde atom who watched from the wings and never, never made a nuisance of herself. She adored the flowers, the lights, the attention and the everlasting stir of Things-Going-On. No wonder she made up her mind to be part of it all some day.

When Angela was five, a miserable creature referred to as the Stork brought a pair of baby sons to Moyna Macgill. Much to Angela's disgust her mother retired from the stage to bring up the twins, and the little girl had to settle down to nursery and school routine. It was all very, very dull.

As they grew older, Angela and her brothers relieved the monotony of schoolrooms by attending "the pictures." They preferred American films, and presently became familiar with the New York skyline, Broadway, Fifth Avenue, California, the mountains, prairies, rivers and deserts of the fascinating country overseas. They knew all the stars in Hollywood and read every item they could find that concerned the film city, American cowboys, New York night life, and dreamed of the day they'd see all these things for themselves.

Their father had died in 1934, leaving very little money, and realization of these dreams seemed most unlikely—except to Angela, who never doubted that they'd come true.

She was thirteen when the Germans moved into Poland and war began to sweep over Europe. The school she was attending in London was evacuated.

"Mummy, do let me go to dramatic school," urged Angela, seeing a bright side to calamity. Why should she go poking off to the country in the wake of a dull school? Why not learn her future business?

But dramatic schools, it appeared, are expensive.

"Never mind, Mummy, I'll get a scholarship," Angela reassured her mother, and began work at once on that wellworn balcony scene in "Romeo and Juliet." She wasn't as old as Shakespeare's Juliet, but she won the scholarship and was paid for a year's dramatic training.

The war roared on. Country after country was overrun by Hitler's steel-helmeted hordes. Then came Dunkirk, and the fall of France. England stood alone, expecting invasion. A horrified America began asking for little English cousins, and small refugees were assigned to eager foster-parents.

Angela's elder sister, known on the London stage as Isolde Denham, had married a well-known young actor-writer, Peter Ustinov, and decided to remain in England for the duration. Moyna MacGill allowed herself to be persuaded to take charge of ten children, including her own three, who were to be sponsored by a generous American gentleman, C. T. Wilson of New York City. Mr. Wilson had arranged that Moyna and her young refugees were to live at Lake Mahopac, New York, and it was considered advisable for Moyna and her family to come on at once. They sailed with the second shipload of child refugees to reach this hemisphere.

"We went up the St. Lawrence River to Montreal, then to New York by train. You can't imagine how marvelous it was to board an American train, to get off in an American station, to see streets and taxis and high buildings we'd seen so often on the screen.

"'Why, it's just the way it was in the pictures!' we kept telling each other. It was like living in a movie."

Angela at fourteen felt herself far too old for school, even an American one, and talked ceaselessly of more dramatic training. One day she and her mother took a train for New York City. Knowing nothing of New York dramatic academies, they ruffled through a directory, saw the name FAGAN, in Rockefeller Center, and decided to apply there. There remained the little matter of what to use for money, but Angela was confident. She mounted Juliet's balcony once more and won another scholarship. You can get anything you want . . . remember?

Her first school role was that of an old Texas woman. Just what she wanted! She knew that Texas drawl from watching American Westerns, and adored doing it.

"Acting has different aspects according to where you are," she asserts. "In England you are content to learn every tiny thing about your profession; you work long and hard, perfecting each scene. An expression, a gesture, an inflection must be exactly right. In New York, you are a little more commercial on the stage. You have an eye on pictures, you aren't content to spend so much time, you must get ahead while you're young. In Hollywood, you don't even think about the stage; you devote yourself to pictures, which are quite different."

In March, 1942, Angela graduated from the Fagan School. The twins were attending the Choate School, and her mother was touring Canada for the RAF with Herbert Wilcox and Anna Neagle, who had organized the benefit.

"I wanted to make some money," Angela confesses. "We had our keep and my tuition, but there was no money coming in. A friend coached me in a take-off on Beatrice Lille called 'I Went To A Marvelous Party.' I heard they were giving auditions at a New York night club, and decided to try for one. I was sixteen but I said I was nineteen so they'd listen to me."

She was a big girl for her age and could pass as nineteen, but she hadn't the experience for the New York spot. An agent who had brought someone else in for an audition heard Angela's act, liked it, and told her he could get her a job in Montreal.

"I was so thrilled!" related the young actress. "Of course I told Mother, and she agreed. She knew we had to go to Canada for our quota numbers, anyway. She cut down some of her evening gowns for me—lovely, sequiny ones—and I sang for six weeks at the Samovar."

Quota numbers came, and the little family re-entered this country as prospective citizens. Just as soon as Uncle Sam will accept them, he'll have two more nephews and two more nieces shiningly eager to swear allegiance.

Eventually, Moyna Macgill arrived in Hollywood on tour, and wired her daughter to join her. In November, 1942, an elated Angela descended from the train, in California at last!

Of course she wanted to be in pictures. She went the rounds of studios, doing her Bee Lillie stunt, but nothing happened. She wasn't discouraged, life was too exciting.

A friend of her mother's mentioned that Angela might be good as the unhappy young girl in "The Picture of Dorian Gray," which Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer was casting. Moyna's agent made an appointment for Angela. Mr. Lewin thought her not right for Dorian, but what about the cockney maid in "Gaslight," also being cast? John Van Druten, long-time friend of the family, was sure she could do the maid role, but George Cukor, who was to direct the picture, said she was too young.

"We thought everything was over," Angela tells now, her lips curling happily over how wrong they'd been. "Whenever we'd call the agent, he'd say: 'Don't worry me. Never mind. You'll hear from me.' Then one night he asked us to come down to his office. We sat outside his door for an hour, wondering what was going on, then he came out and announced that he'd signed me to a wonderful contract with M-G-M. I wouldn't get the parts I'd tested for, but I had a contract."

Presently, however, they got out Angela's screen test, rewrote the part of the cockney maid in "Gaslight" and gave her the script. Her mother helped her, and the next thing she knew she was playing with Charles Boyer and Ingrid Bergman.

Following "Gaslight," Angela with her hair down and no heels, did a fifteen-year-old girl in "National Velvet." Then M-G-M had a change of heart. Maybe, after all, she could do the unhappy girl in "Dorian Gray." (She's doing it now.)

Angela has lived with older people so much that she doesn't feel at ease with girls of her own age. She doesn't understand them yet, and can't join in chatter about blind dates, snoods and so forth. Girls wearing six silver foxes, slinky, sophisticated gowns, and faces practically smothered in make-up seem fantastic to her. "Like totem poles," she giggles. "Not believable, but fun to watch."

Hollywood works hard, much harder than outsiders imagine. "The life isn't easy," declares Angela. "But I love it. People say: 'What do you do? You have your hair fixed, lipstick put on by Perc Westmore, and you sit around waiting to speak a word here and there. What's hard about that?' They don't know how early you get up. Yes, I have my hair fixed, but I've never even seen Perc Westmore!

"My mother plays the Duchess in 'Dorian Gray,' which is nice. We have no scenes together, but we talk everything over. Mother had made a few pictures in England, but her experience was mostly in the theatre. On the stage you can 'act,' but on the screen everything must be real. You think a thing and it's reflected in your face."

Hollywood is a dream come true. Even nicer than the way she thought it would be, for people are so good to her. No one forgets to help.

So far, so good.

And Angela will keep on dreaming.

ALEXANDER KNOX

Mr. Olivier was feeling jovial on this particular evening so indulged in a little horseplay, a very trying thing for other actors in the cast. He was supposed to make his entrance upstage left through a small door. However, he first called from the wings at the right, so Mr. Knox presumed that the entrance—for a change—was to be made from that point and so adjusted himself on the stage, flinging his lines to the right.

To his consternation, the answer came from the left. So Mr. Knox reversed his field, locked the small door through which a checkmated Mr. Olivier was supposed to make his entrance, and opened the small wicket. This quick thinking neatly turned the trickster tables on Romeo, who was forced to play the entire scene offstage, shouting his lines through the window at Mr. Onstage Knox.

Returning to the importance of female relatives in early training, the paternal Aunt Agnes of Mr. Knox was, in her day, happily classed in dramatic ability with Bernhardt and Duse. However, in those days the daughter of a smalltown Presbyterian family did not go on the stage. She gave dramatic readings of the classics instead.

Up and down the length and breadth of Canada she traveled, earning the distinction of having Lake Agnes at Banff named in her honor because she was the first white woman ever to view it. At one time she was reader in Philosophy at Edinburgh University, but once she married, she settled happily in Boston. There she lived during the winter, teaching English at Boston University. Summers, however, were always spent on the Canadian family farm—which brings nephew Alexander into the story.

She encouraged him to read Shakespeare. That is, he was placed in an apple orchard and ordered to hurl the cadences of "Macbeth," "King Lear," and "Merry Wives Of Windsor" with such clarity of tone and perfection of diction that he could be heard and understood a quarter of a mile away. After this artistic exercise he frequently drove the binder during the grain harvest, or milked several cows.

In this way he learned early to combine an esthetic undertaking with the practical aspect of living, an accomplishment that stood him in good stead while he was running a repertory theatre in Boston some years later.

This took place during the very depths of the depression, when a man's wardrobe was the suit he was wearing. Mr. Knox and his roommate both suffered accidents on the same day: Mr. Knox spilled paint (he was redecorating the theater) on his coat; his roommate suffered a dinner mishap to his trousers. Both had important engagements the next day, but luckily the roommate's date took place in the forenoon, whereas Mr. Knox had agreed to meet Mrs. Harriman for late luncheon. This was crucially important, as Mrs. Harriman was one of the patrons of the theater.

So the roommate wore a suit composed of his coat and Mr. Knox' trousers in the morning, while Mr. Knox remained in bed. A scant few minutes before Mr. Knox was due at his luncheon engagement, the roommate arrived, divested himself, and occupied the bed, while Mr. Knox assumed the garb and scorched down the street, an artist about to discuss an artistic problem while clothed in practical compromise.

In this Boston stock company Mr. Knox—because of his Canadian accent—played British juveniles, with the aid of a constantly-carried tennis racket. Bearing this fact in mind, he decided that the American theatre being comatose (during one depression week there were exactly seven plays open on Broadway) he would try his luck in London. There, because of his accent, he was put to work playing American juveniles, with the aid of a turtle-neck sweater bearing huge football numerals.

This was very discouraging to Alexander Knox, who decided that perhaps the stage had no place for him. He returned to his home (London, Ontario, a lovely city of eighty thousand population) and settled down to write.

He produced first a romance entitled "Bride of Quietness," which had a considerable success. Because this book was produced as a work of art—and everyone knows that a purely artistic effort is supposed to be a financial failure—its monetary triumph confused everyone, most of all Mr. Knox.

Promptly he turned to another field: detective fiction. He wrote and published five murder mysteries under an assumed name (an alias that he refuses to disclose) thinking that, if an artistic effort made money, a commercial venture in writing should make him a Croesus kid. Came the disillusion: his first two whodunits together netted less than "Bride Of Quietness."

In order to recover from his boredom with creative fiction, Knox returned to the stage to do, as noted previously, "Romeo and Juliet" with Heathcliff and Scarlett, and followed that with a brilliant stint in "Jupiter Laughs." Warner Brothers liked his work so well that they made a deal to cast him as the intellectual Van Weyden in the Edward G. Robinson starrer, "The Sea Wolf."

Memorable was the scene in which the blind and brutal captain (Robinson) was tricked by Knox into thinking that his bullet had not been effective, so saving the life of another member of the crew. When the picture was released, householders were so Knox-conscious that they were pestering their grocers for Alexander instead of gelatin. Fan mail poured into the studio and the executive staff announced great plans for their new rave. But, unfortunately, they had no story script prepared at that time.

A month went by—two, three. Knox had gone down to Malibu, there to indulge his enthusiasm for fishing. As the beach at Malibu is long and gently sloped, fishing is not good, but Alexander perfected a system whereby he swam out to deep water, dropped a baited hook, then towed the line in to shore, connected it to a fishing rod with an oversize reel. And, completely baffling critics of the system, he actually caught an occasional sea bass.

Tiring of this sport he went north to catch the wily salmon, thence into the High Sierras after the leaping mountain trout. At the end of six months he had enjoyed himself thoroughly, but there was still no script ready for him so he asked Warner's please to excuse him. They settled his contract handsomely and with apologies, and Mr. Knox went back to Broadway.

After a series of successful plays there, he returned to Hollywood to do the curate part in "This Above All," and two years later returned to create a Nazi in "None Shall Escape." About this time 20th Century-Fox was planning to make "Wilson," so Mr. Zanuck wanted a full length transcription of the script cut; several persons (mainly with radio experience) were secured to read the parts without thought of personal appearance. Once the officials at 20th had heard the Knox tones, he was set to age twenty-five years and become President. (The first time a Canadian has made it, which just about wipes out the boundary, which has never meant anything anyway.)

Aside from fishing, the drama, and his typewriter, Knox has a number of additional enthusiasms. In his Canadian home he has set up a complete woodworking shop where, during vacations, he reproduces antique furniture. He also plays piano, a good game of chess, a middling game of golf, and the world's worst tennis. This description of his tennis prowess emanates not from Mr. Knox' enemies, but from the gentleman himself—who proudly announces that he has never won a game in his life.

Which is indicative of Mr. Knox' character. And something else: he is something of a worrier. He thinks it may be this trait that has equipped him to play men old enough to be his father and his grandfather on stage and before the camera. And he hopes that, by relaxing, he may be able to play a string of young roles in succession. Hollywood friends, all in good fun, have been quick to suggest a title for his next picture, should he make good that promise: "The Rejuvenation of Young Mr. Wilson."

greatness has never been confined to his characterizations before the camera. He is a gentleman in every sense of the word. Other men sense this right-guy-ness instantly, and like him.

Women appreciate Pat, too, and I dare say soft glances are occasionally wafted in his direction. Which is wasted effort on the girls' part, I hasten to add. To Pat, the world is divided into two parts: 1) people, a classification which embraces everyone, both man and woman; and 2) women, which embraces only his wife, Eloise, and his daughter, Mavourneen.

The second lady in Pat's life, Mavourneen, is now ten—and unless all signs fail, has every intention of following in her father's cinematic footsteps.

When Pat was searching for the little girl, presumably aged eight, who was to play the part of his daughter in "Secret Command," Mavourneen called herself forcibly to her father's attention. "I could do that part," she said in the vernacular she has learned from her dad.

Pat stalled. "That little girl is supposed to be only eight—two years younger than you are," he explained.

When the picture was well in production, Mavourneen visited the set one day and learned that the little girl who was actually playing the daughter part was only five. Pat explained that it hadn't been possible to find a suitable boy of five for the part as originally written, so the ages of the children had been switched. Whereas the script Mavourneen had read called for a boy of five and a girl of eight, now the picture was being shot with a girl of five and a boy of nine.

"It's a funny thing," said Miss Mavourneen bitterly, "that a big change like that could be made in a script, but a little change like two years in the girl's age couldn't be made."

Relations between father and daughter were strained for several days, until Pat made a camp tour and returned from the trip bringing souvenirs for all three children. In addition to Mavourneen in the O'Brien household, there is Sean, aged eight, and Terence Kevin, aged 3. Because of Terry's initials, his father usually calls him Technical Knockout.

Like most Irishmen, Pat is a superb story-teller. He has a repertoire that a month on a speaking tour would barely dent. One of my favorite yarns has to do with a picture, made several years ago, in which Pat was supposed to fly a plane without ever having had an hour of flight training.

"Don't be silly," he told the director. "Remember the delicate nerves of my insurance company."

The director felt that this bit of dash would add so much to the story's value that he persisted in his notion, taking it up with a technical director who, in turn, took it up with an aircraft mechanic. That expert decided that the plane's controls could be so arranged that Pat would have to assume a minimum of responsibility, while a seasoned pilot (invisible to the camera) would be tucked into the passenger seat and from there would handle the dual controls on a blind basis.

Just as the scene was to be shot, the fellow who drives for Pat arrived. He knew nothing of the flight plans made, of course, but he was entirely aware of the fact that Pat was not a pilot; he couldn't even drive his own car (and didn't learn until a few years ago).

With bulging eyes and sagging jaw, the chauffeur watched Pat rush to the plane, leap in, and take off. He took four or five great strides forward and lifted a horrified voice in remonstrance. "Hey, hey! Come BACK!" he yelled.

Then, in the sighed tones of self-commiseration, he summed up his position in the matter. "There goes the best job I ever had."

In closing, I know I should say something about Pat's unfailing wit. One day a friend of the O'Brien family arrived at the Lodge for a brief stay. She was elegantly dressed in black, topped by a huge cartwheel of black straw. Pat leaned down to greet her, then studied the situation. "I think this is the first time in my life," he observed, "that I've kissed a girl under an old Caruso record!"

There's a day coming when you'll want to stand up and cheer the greatest victory in history.

But let's not start cheering yet

In fact, let's not start it at all—over here. Let's leave it to the fellows who are doing the job—to begin the celebrating.

Let's keep bearing down till we get the news of final victory from the only place such news can come: the battleline.

edited by ALAN D. BOGORAD

Anyone who has learned to write, can learn to draw! This helpful book removes the mysticism that has surrounded art. By reducing the elements of drawing to its simple steps, it teaches THE BEGINNER to draw, and then to advance into more and more difficult subjects.

As you can see from the above illustrations showing the 9 sections—this complete course covers 9 BRANCHES of practical Art. Each division is explained by a specialist. No previous knowledge on your part is expected. Within a few days you will be drawing with an ease and enjoyment you never thought possible. For the experienced and professional artist, it is a REFERENCE BOOK and veritable mine of information.

This book guides you from the first stroke on paper to selling the finished art work. Includes specific instruction, advice, tricks, time-savers, special effects, on: Still Life, Animals, Anatomy, Human Figure, Faces and portraits, Lettering, Layouts, Cartoons, Animated Cartooning; advertising and commercial Art, Illustrations for Newspapers, Magazines, Books, Designing Book Jackets, The Use of Color, etc. Teaches you by sketches, diagrams, and instructions, how to draw:—hands, feet, heads, bodies, ears, noses, mouths, eyes—in different positions, of different sexes and ages, and with different perspectives. Shows you how to attain and indicate: action, proportion, balance, composition, shading, rhythm, symmetry; and how to express—laughter, anger, terror, grief, surprise and other emotions. Also, how to draw caricatures, cartoons and comic drawings. Also how to letter, with 37 complete Alphabets shown. Includes a glossary of Art Terms, Supplies, Type of Work, Mediums, etc. Completely and profusely illustrated with over ONE THOUSAND Instructive and Example Drawings, Sketches and Pictures.

The METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S LION'S ROAR

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

You remember how America thrilled as a voice came over the radio—"Our planes have bombed Tokyo!"

* * * *

We thrilled again and again to learn how Lieutenant Colonel Doolittle led his men in the greatest gamble of the war—how they took off from the carrier "Hornet"—how they loosed their bombs on the city—how some were forced to abandon their planes over China—and how they found their way out.

* * * *

Now that epic story reaches the screen in M-G-M's mighty film, "Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo", based on Captain Ted W. Lawson's Collier's serial and best-selling book.

* * * *

Now you can see for yourself what that adventure meant to the men who went out to avenge Pearl Harbor—the human story behind the boys who left home and sweethearts and wives to dare death in the skies.

"Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo" is the story of their courage and their glory.

* * * *

It is one of the very few truly great pictures to come out of this war.

* * * *

Director Mervyn LeRoy and Producer Sam Zimbalist have imbued it with mounting excitement, gripping tension and warm human understanding.

* * * *

M-G-M has provided an ace cast—Van Johnson, Robert Walker (great roles for two rising young actors), Phyllis Thaxter, to name a few.

* * * *

AND—as a crowning touch—SPENCER TRACY as Lieutenant Colonel Doolittle.

* * * *

"Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo" is a thrilling picture that will make your American heart swell with pride... a prophecy of things to come.

* * * *

As this is being written our planes are coming closer and closer to Tokyo. By the time you read it they may even have bombed Hirohito's capital again. If not, it won't be long now.

* * * *

And if we seem a little excited about the picture, you'll understand why when you see it.

TOKYO BOMBED AGAIN!

INSIDE HOLLYWOOD

By FREDDA DUDLEY

It was Alfred Hitchcock's 44th birthday, on the set of "Spellbound" (Vanguard pic), and Ingrid Bergman planned a surprise party. The over-sized cigar was one of the gag gifts.

PARTY AND A PARTING

The occasion was what is termed "brilliant" in Hollywood. It was also somewhat funny. RKO had imported Cantinflas, gifted Mexican comedian, to star in a picture with George Murphy, and the studio had decided to give a rally for him.

Everyone was there, starting with Mr. Koerner—head of the studio—and ending with five Mexican bus boys who had read in their Spanish language newspapers that Cantinflas was to be honored and decided to lift a Bravo in his honor. Jinx Falkenburg and her vivacious, lovely mother were "among those present"; Carlos Ramirez, Lupe in a gorgeous chartreuse hat, Margo surrounded by admiring males, and Cugat.

The party started at five. Promptly at 6:30 there was great hubbub at the doorway klieg lights enough to blind Senor Apollo himself were flashed on, still and newsreel cameras sprouted from the shoulder of every third person in the room, and Cantinflas, himself, stoutly entouraged by the entire Mexican embassy, arrived.

Your "Insider" had the brief privilege and pleasure of talking to Senor Cantinflas (in English), and would diagnose his attitude as bewildered but beguiled.

The two happiest persons at this clambake would have seemed to be, to the uninitiated observer, Lucille Ball and Desi Arnaz. Lucille was wearing a black dress, a huge black hat, and a chianti wool coat, stroller length. She looked like a Technicolor dream. Desi looked pretty sharp himself, outfitted in a staff sergeant's suntan uniform. Everyone said Lucille looked wonderful and she said she was crazy about "Ziegfeld Follies," which she has just finished at Metro. Desi said he had never felt better, and that he liked his work at Birmingham General Hospital because it was possible for him to get back to the ranch regularly.

On the following night they went dining and dancing at Ciro's, and the following morning Lucille filed suit for divorce. The dailies described Hollywood's attitude as "stunned," which was naive. A good many persons have known for a long time that there would be fireworks in the Arnaz menage unless a miracle protected Lucille from hearing certain rumors. Basic difference between them is this: Desi's attitude on marriage is continental; Lucille's is not.

Because they have been fiercely, overwhelmingly in love, it may be that they will reconcile. But even that will take time.

NO MIKE FRIGHT

When that much overworked bird, the stork, delivered a lusty son to Mr. and Mrs. William Marshall (Michele Morgan) there was no hesitation about his title: "Michael William Marshall" was instantly posted on his birth certificate and he will be called Mike You see, Michele spent a good deal of her adolescent time reading American periodicals, and she soon selected Mike as her favorite American name. She did her best to encourage her friends to call her Mike, but Michele was as close as she got. Now, at last, she has a bona fide American Mike in her own family.

RING, BELLE AND LEFT HOOK:

Probably you read a brief account of the Crane-Bey fisticuffs in your daily paper, or perhaps the paper still needed its space for somewhat larger battles. Tenny rate, Turhan took Lana to a private party where she danced (with the savoir faire expected of divorced Hollywood couples) with Steve. Steve noticed that Lana was wearing a handsome ruby-avec-diamond ring that he had given her during marital days. When they broke up, Steve left the ring—an heirloom—with Lana, on condition that she put it in safe deposit for Cheryl. Lana explained that she had forgotten the rules, but slipped off the ring and gave it to Steve for safe keeping. Up to this point, all was smooth, though not entirely happy.

Mr. Bey, whose gallantry is as unfailing as his understanding of English is fallible, came to the conclusion from the bits of conversation he had overheard, and Lana's removal of the ring, that Lana was getting the rugged end of a post-marital argument and came to her rescue with a very efficient pair of fists.

In other words, this was one of those deals in which two nice guys got all mixed up over nothing, thus embarrassing a beautiful gal.

PSYCHIC PSUMMONS:

Ida Lupino, on the set of "Pillar To Post," was a bundle of nerves. When Sydney Greenstreet asked her what on earth was the matter she said, "That's the trouble. It's nothing on earth—it's completely out of this world. I'm having one of my psychic feelings again. I dreamed last night that Louis was going to be in an automobile accident."

(Although Ida and Louis are separated and will probably be divorced before long, they are deeply and sincerely fond of one another and will undoubtedly remain fast friends.)

Greenstreet laughed and suggested that Ida telephone an astrologer whom she occasionally consults. In a few moments Ida returned, looking like the last act of "Camille." "She says," she reported, "that Louis is going to figure in an automobile accident. I think I'd better telephone him and warn him."

But before she could reach the set telephone, a call came in for her. It was Louis. "Wait until you hear this," he announced in disgust. "I've just had the craziest automobile accident. Nothing serious, but it barely escaped being horrible."

QUOTABLES FROM NOTABLES:

Barbara Stanwyck, interviewing a new maid, asked, "Are you unmarried?"

"Only occasionally, ma'am," said the girl in all solemnity.

Mrs. Otto Kruger complained to her husband that vegetables were absurdly expensive. Urbanely, the articulate Otto answered, "When you consider the botanical name of the product, the entomological label of the insect that preys upon it, and the pharmaceutical title of the chemical to kill it, somebody's got to pay."

SHOE, SHOE BABY:

Angela Lansbury, the brilliant British actress who won plaudits as the maid in "Gaslight," says that, in line with the current practice of calling motion picture personalities by their most noticeable feature (Anita Colby is called The Face, Sinatra is The Voice, Betty Grable is The Shape, and Toni Seven is The Number), she will shortly be known as The Heel.

When she was being considered for the "Gaslight" part she was ushered into the office of a famous casting director. "Hmm," he mused. "You're rather tall. Hmm, take off those high heels and let's see how you look."

She complied, and was given the nod. Not too tall, according to his visualization of the maid. So Angela was forwarded to another studio official for scrutiny.

When she was ushered into this second office, the S.O. studied Miss Lansbury critically and harumphed, "You're pretty tall, aren't you? Well, get off those heels and let's see how you look."

In stocking feet she didn't seem too tall to him, either; so she was sent on up the executive line to one of the highest studio officials. This H.S.O. regarded Angela over the top of his glasses. "Tall girl, aren't you?" he said. "Now if you'll just . . ."

Angela stepped out of her pomps, but she had reached the end of feminine endurance. "I'm five feet seven inches tall, in stocking feet!" she announced. "Just an inch shorter than Miss Bergman, who has the stellar role in the picture."

AND THEIR TEARS FLOWED LIKE WINE:

The current era may sometime in future be designated as the Season of Suspended Tradition. Take that Brown Derby Gin Rummy situation, for instance. For years it has been customary for George Raft to bring a partner or an entire party into the Derby at noon for luncheon and a protracted game of gin; Ken Murray is another deck devotee who liked to mix salads and spades; so is Dick Powell, and so is Don Ameche.

But six weeks ago a regretful ukase was handed down by Bob Cobb, operator of the Derby restaurants—and incidentally an intimate friend of each of the handhounds: no more rummy could be played at the Derby tables.

In a town where a vicious rumor constantly circulates, saying that persons have been known to marry and have children while waiting in line for luncheon and dinner, tables must be used for dining only.

JUNIOR JIVE:

For several years Metro and Jenkins friends have celebrated Jackie's birthday on August 19. Recently an interviewer asked Jackie the date of his birth. "August 29," said Jackie. The studio publicist, sitting in on the interview, voiced a correction.

"August 19 is right," she said. "I have your studio biography here, Butch."

Butch sighed in the way children have with an obdurate, though mistaken elder.

Several weeks later Doris Dudley, Butch's pixielike mother, flashed through the studio and was buttonholed by this publicist who sought to get the date situation clarified. Miss Dudley giggled. "August 29 is right," she said. "I happened to be going through some old papers in the safé deposit box the other day, and noticed that we had been celebrating the wrong date for years."

Ellen Powell, aged six, who has been called since her birth by the formal title, "Miss Powell," even in the depths of her family, was out walking her dog when it was assaulted by a much larger dog. Without an instant's hesitation, Miss Powell undertook to separate the belligerents, to the serious injury of her own small face. It was necessary for surgeons to take seventeen stitches in her cheek, neck and forehead, but it is believed that no scars will result.

BEAU GESTE:

As you remember or have read repeatedly, Bette Davis' big break came with her superb portrayal of Mildred in "Of Human Bondage."

Warner's are currently engaged in refilming it, with Eleanor Parker in the Mildred role. On the first day of shooting, Bette sent Eleanor a lei of gardenias with a card saying, "I hope this part does as much for you as it did for me."

WAR IS SHELL:

Jimmie Cagney, the favorite actor of plenty of people in Hollywood, excused himself from a small conversational group gathered on a studio street, walked to the curb, and turned out his coat pockets. A cloud of peanut shells fluttered into the gutter.

Grinning, Jimmie explained: "I went to the cigarette machine the other day—no cigarettes. Then I went to the gum machine—no gum! But I found a peanut machine filled, so now I'm a peanut fiend."

JULIET'S FIRST BALCONY:

Miss Juliet Colman, beautiful daughter of the Ronald Colman's, is currently residing in a cradle with a society consciousness. This rockered chateau is a French Provincial job about 175 years old and was discovered in an antique shop, then was subsequently scrubbed and sterilized by Constance Moore when she was anticipating her own daughter, Gina, now three years old. When Gina was too big for the cradle, it was loaned to the Herbert Marshalls for their daughter, and then loaned to the Lee Bowmans for their son. On the side of the cradle there is a large silver plaque, and the name of each user is engraved thereon.

FEELING NO PAYNE:

As you undoubtedly know, John Payne has been given his honorable discharge from the army. His first free-civilian act was to take his handsome young daughter, Julie, to Carmel (some three hundred miles north of Los Angeles) for a holiday. As John had neither car nor gas in the resort, he was traveling by taxi when it was necessary.

One night John and a group of friends were journeying around the celebrated 17-mile drive, John in front with the taxi driver.

"You just out of the Army?" the driver wanted to know.

John said he was, and added, "How does it happen that you, since you are in uniform, are driving a taxi?"

"I'm on three-day pass," the driver explained. "I always do this every chance I get. Now, about you: still got your clothes?"

John said he did have. Promptly the driver began to list the items and to quote prices. A brisk exchange took place, so that, before the drive was finished, the driver had made arrangements to purchase John's tailored khaki wardrobe. Even when John gave his name, it meant nothing to the merchant. As far as he was concerned, the character riding in the front seat was just a source of supply of goods that could be resold to fellow G.I.'s at a profit.

DARK WATERS (United Artists) is a psychological drama dealing with dark and sinister plottings.

Leslie Calvin (Merle Oberon), one of the few survivors of a ship torpedoing which killed her mother and father, arrives in New Orleans and is escorted by Dr. George Grover (Franchot Tone) to the plantation home of her "aunt and uncle" (Fay Bainter and John Qualen).

The somberness of the surrounding bayou, and the strange manner of a "family friend"—a Mr. Sidney (Thomas Mitchell)—give Leslie a feeling of impending doom. And quite rightly, too, for thereafter begins a series of strange, unexplained happenings: lights going mysteriously on and off, and a voice calling her name. Already in a distraught condition, Leslie is easily convinced that she is going mad, and that the lights and voices are but the products of a mentally upset imagination.

So far so good, and all is going as the villains would have it.

Then Leslie calls Dr. Grover for help, whereupon they're both captured and taken to the swamp: next step, murder!

And murder stories are better not advance-described beyond this point, so your reviewer will leave you to fill in the rest for yourself, when you see the picture. Our verdict is that you'll be thrilled and chilled and go home thinking about this one long after you've seen it.

THE PRINCESS AND THE PIRATE (Goldwyn) A highly implausible fairy tale, of the zany comedy variety, with a gang of pirates at their swashbucklingest and replete with cutlasses, boots, knives—and Bob Hope.

You won't believe a scene of it—but you're not expected to—so just sit back and relax.

Bob plays a ham vaudeville actor of the seventeenth century, who flees England by popular demand. Virginia Mayo is the Beautiful Maiden, and what's more she is beautiful! She, too, is taking quick leave of Britain, for reasons that have to do with her father's not allowing her to marry the man of her cherce.

Alas, their ship is scuttled by pirates, led by the ruthless Hook (Victor McLaglen). And from there on in the laughs come tumbling over themselves, as Hope tries to outwit the naughty pirate and protect the lovely maid.

Comes then the English navy to the rescue, the girl and her father are reunited, The Hook gets his just deserts, and Hope gets no dessert at all. This refers to the ending of the picture, which is laugh-delightful—and anybody who tells you about it before you see it should be made to walk the bloody plank.

IN THE MEANTIME, DARLING (20th Century-Fox) A hotel so crowded with officers' wives that everyone lives on a rigid eating, bathing, and sleeping schedule is hardly the ideal spot for a honeymoon. Especially if the bride is a wealthy young college girl (Jeanne Crain) and the boy, a young, about-to-be alerted lieutenant (Frank Latimore).

This is not so much a drama of how a young couple adjust to one another as how they adjust to the abnormal conditions of wartime living. Jeanne, as the girl from the lap of luxury, does all the wrong things—such as using the bath at another's scheduled time, eating after the breakfast hour, and mistaking the colonel's wife for the cook.

Admitting and being forgiven her initial mistakes, however, she makes one more—this time involving her husband. But an almost wrecked marriage is saved at the last minute and when the parting time finally comes, they say goodbye feeling they've already shared a lifetime of happiness.

Though stickily sentimental at times, the sketchy plot is sustained by the sensitive portrayals of Jeanne Crain and Frank Latimore, and the comedy of Stanley Prager and Gale Robbins.

THAT'S MY BABY (Republic) Betty Moody (Ellen Drew) takes on the assignment of digging her father (Minor Watson) out of his deep well of being mad at the whole world and despondent. Desperate enough to try anything, Betty calls in Dr. Svatsky (Leonid Kinskey), famed but funny psychiatrist, whose prescription for the patient is—laughter.

In search of this medicine, Betty and her boyfriend (Richard Arlen) make a vaudeville-musical out of the picture by calling in a lot of magicians, musicians and gag men. They also go around tearing paper from night club walls, having learned from Betty's mother what they think is the right clue. And as the whole thing turns out, that is the right clue, and it's Mr. Moody's "baby"—the cartoon he'd drawn twenty years before.

It's all rather labored, as comedy film fare, but Ellen Drew and Richard Arlen do the best they can with the material at hand.

THE CLIMAX (Universal) is an old story ("The Phantom of the Opera") not in the least improved upon by this re-doing of it, except for the addition of sweet-voiced Susanna Foster.

The suspense, if any, is almost accidental and the thrills and chills it gives you will be to the credit of Boris Karloff, as the demented opera house physician, doing the best he can with a formula plot which drags heavily, with all its faults obviously exposed.

On the tenth anniversary of the mysterious disappearance of Marcellina (June Vincent), greatest opera star of her day, Dr. Hohner thinks he hears the dead voice singing again. Actually, it's not Marcellina reappearing from the grave, but a pretty newcomer, named Angela (Susanna Foster), with a voice so like Marcellina's that the similarity is uncanny, even to the impresario who makes the discovery, gives Angela her chance, and arranges for her to sing Marcellina's old roles.

Dr. Hohner, resenting this intrusion on the memories he holds sacred, is determined to still the voice that's like his Marcellina's. The conflict then is true love (Turhan Bey's) versus the hypnotic powers of the doctor-villain, with "will Angela ever sing again" the question that's to be decided in "the climax."

Filmed in Technicolor, the picture is pretty in a sceneful sort of way—but stripped of its feathers and finery, it somehow comes out being as mild as a milkshake.

THE MASTER RACE (RKO), or so they call themselves, may not completely give up their ideas of world dominance when finally they lay down their arms on V-day. We are warned here that they plan to disseminate over Europe to sow their seeds of hatred and distrust. And truth or fiction, the idea commands "suppose it is true" consideration.

The story starts with Col. Von Beck lecturing a group of German officers on how to conceal their true identities, biding their time until Germany can again re-arm. Von Beck has himself shipped to a Nazi concentration camp in Kolar, a small Belgian village, and is subsequently liberated by the advancing Allied forces. When free, he goes about his fiendish plan to confuse and disunite the townsfolk. Kolar is fertile field for the colonel, and it is easy, indeed, for him to twist the issues in the minds of these battle-dazed and war-weary people.

But as it turns out, one of Von Beck's own soldiers gives the evidence that sends him before the firing squad.

A thought-provoking and interesting film, with especially capable and convincing performances by George Coulouris as Col. Von Beck, Osa Massen, Morris Carnovsky and Carl Esmond.

Are You in the Know?

How much should you tip?
☐ 10%
☐ A dime for each
☐ Fifty cents

A special guest—so you splurge a bit. You can defrost old frozen-face with 10%—a safe tip in restaurants. (Though for a modest tearoom meal, a dime apiece is right.) Why be flustered by uncertainties? Forget even the little worries of trying days by learning the difference between Kotex and ordinary napkins. The ends of Kotex don't show for they're pressed flat . . . not thick or blunt . . . so with Kotex there's no telltale line . . . you'll look smooth, feel secure!

What is she doing?
☐ Slicing
☐ Dribbling
☐ Lobbing

While you cheer from the sidelines—your team's star is dribbling the ball. She's going places, but fast! And what's to keep you from going places—basketball games or wherever? Surely not "difficult" days! Not when the super safety and comfort of Kotex can be yours! You see, Kotex has a 4-ply safety center. It protects you in an extra special way. And the softness of Kotex has staying-power. Unlike other pads, it doesn't just "feel" soft at first touch, but actually stays soft while wearing! So why shouldn't a girl be carefree, more comfortable—with Kotex sanitary napkins?

Which neckline flatters a l-o-n-g neck?
☐ V ☐ Deep Oval
☐ High

Poets write about "swanlike" necks—but never an ode to an ostrich! No need to emphasize your lovely long throat. Wear your necklines high, wide and handsome . . . round or square. "Choker" beads will flatter you, too. So will personal daintiness. Don't neglect it, on "those" days above all. Remember Quest Powder, the Kotex deodorant, was made for use on sanitary napkins. Quest removes all question of offending. It's the safe, unscented powder that keeps you assured—and sweet.

SAN DIEGO I LOVE YOU (Universal) is the story of school professor, Philip McCooley (Edward Everett Horton), amateur inventor; his four small sons, and his lovely blonde daughter, Virginia (Louise Allbritton).

When father's latest invention, a self-inflating rubber life raft, brings an offer from the Caldwell firm to demonstrate in San Diego, it seems that at last opportunity is knocking on the door. But the sole support of five doesn't want to forfeit the security of his teaching job for a purely speculative proposition. Daughter Virginia, however, is more of the adventuresome type, with the result that not many scenes later we find the whole family warming the seats of a San Diego hotel lobby.

And as if housing troubles were not enough to complicate the lives of our little family, another blow descends. John Caldwell (Jon Hall), owner of the firm, is not favorably disposed to Mr. McCooley's invention, since it was the McCooley menage who evicted him from his train compartment on their recent trip. All a mistake, of course, but not one conducive to everlasting friendship.

Eventually, though, love finds a way, and Mr. Hall and Miss Allbritton get together in many amusing scenes, such as the "Can't Take It With You" one in which she persuades a dead-pan bus driver (Buster Keaton) to drive the long way home, via the beach road, in the interests of beauty.

Amusing this one, all the way through.

TALL IN THE SADDLE (RKO) – Lock up the women and children and duck behind the bar, because here comes a real rootin', tootin' western!

John Wayne is the "tall in the saddle" furiner who comes to town to find out "who done it;" Ella Raines is a gun-totin', knife-throwin' lass (and mighty purty, we add) who sends a bullet past his ear at their first meeting, but winds up loving and being loved in the finale clinches.

Audrey Long, as the sweet city gal, provides the necessary love-interest complication, and Ward Bond, as the crooked judge, figures prominently in the menace department.

BRAZIL (Republic) co-stars Tito Guizar and Virginia Bruce, and has Veloz and Yolanda introducing a new dance (akin to the Samba) which they call—that's right, the Brazil!

Miss Bruce, it should be explained for reasons of plot, is a writer. She has written a best-seller called "Why Marry a Latin?" then goes to Rio, meets Mr. Guizar, comes through a confusing mix-up involving an entirely imaginary twin brother (the same Guizar) and finally finds she can answer her own question.

All of which is good fun—plus the comedy of Edward Everett Horton, the songs of Ary Barroso (the celebrated Latin American composer), and a Rio de Janiero carnival sequence.

DANGEROUS JOURNEY (released by 20th Century-Fox) is a feature film record of the Armand Denis-Leila Roosevelt expedition through Africa and Asia. Essentially a travelogue, it's not entirely without a message as such. On the contrary, the purpose, as explained, is to acquaint us with the lands and peoples the war has made familiar to our men in the services. And one suspects that the views shown—particularly as regards the representation of India—are not altogether objectively, impartially scenic. Picture propaganda, intentional or otherwise, should be judged and recognized for what it is—and we are by now much too familiar with the deceptive device not to recognize it.

MY PAL, WOLF (RKO) will remind you canine-lovers of the old Rin Tin Tin series, being a story about a dog and a little girl named Gretchen (Sharyn Moffett) who meet at the bottom of an old dry well and are fast, fine friends until the Army authorities do them separate.

The point is, you see, that Wolf is a runaway from a dog-training camp and has to be returned thereto. But Gretchen's visiting Washington to present her case to the Secretary of War is not entirely in vain, for she's given a police-puppy to stand in for Wolf while he's away to the wars.

PICTURES IN

AT 20TH CENTURY-FOX:

NOB HILL, in Technicolor, with Joan Bennett, George Raft, Vivian Blaine and Peggy Ann Garner. Miss Bennett has been working on the picture with muscles stiffened by cleaning her basement, washing windows, and indulging in similar non-actressy activities. She couldn't get a man to do this work, so calmly did it herself. She's quite a gal. And note, too, that this casting puts George Raft on the 20th lot at the same time that Betty Grable is working here. Argus-eyed studio employees have, to date, been intensely disappointed by the fact that the ex-sweethearts haven't met in the commissary!

HANGOVER SQUARE has Laird Cregar, George Sanders, Linda Darnell and the inimitable Reginald Gardiner (wittiest man in Hollywood). Sanders is the author of a tome entitled entitled "Crime On My Hands" which is now available at your local bookshop. George is currently using time between picture shots to work on another book. Remember when Somnambulistic George spent all his spare time sleeping?

BILLY ROSE'S DIAMOND HORSESHOE is the new Grable-Dick Haymes opus being shot in Technicolor. In the Acapulco number Betty wears so scanty a costume that she has been having luncheon exclusively in her dressing room, as she felt a trifle too gypsy-rose-lee to appear in public. Members of the armed forces please note, for future reference.

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE is a comedy, in Technicolor, with Fred MacMurray (making his first appearance at 20th), Joan Leslie (making her first appearance on loanout from Warner's) and a pretty little 20th Century native called June Haver.

CZARINA is probably going to be this blase reviewer's favorite picture of the month for five reasons, to wit: Tallulah Bankhead, Charles Coburn, Anne Baxter, William Eythe, and Vincent Price. Story has to do with the escapades of Russia's celebrated Catherine, and it is replete with the celebrated Lubitsch touches. In one delightful sequence Bill Eythe, as the bearded Dragoon, leaves his regiment as a lieutenant and returns twenty-four hours later, a colonel. Unfortunately, the title of the picture will probably be changed, because officials at 20th don't feel that the single tab "Czarina" conveys the full comedy content of the production. A one-hundred-dollar reward has been offered by the studio to any member thereof who submits a satisfactory title. So far "Affair of State," "The Empress Proposes," have been suggested seriously. Frivolous minded members of the department have offered, after viewing Bill Eythe's sparse chin wavers, the title "The Hesitant Beard." And what's wrong with the label, "The Reluctant Dragoon?"

AT REPUBLIC:

LAKE PLACID SERENADE, with Vera Hruba Ralston, Brad Taylor, and brilliantly funny (as always) Vera Vague.

GRISSLY'S MILLIONS, with Paul Kelly and Virginia Grey.

THE GREAT FLAMMARION, with Erich von Stroheim, Mary Beth Hughes, and Dan Duryea (who did an excellent job in "Mrs. Parkington" as Edward Arnold's dissolute, caddish son, and who will win a supporting Oscar one of these days, if given the proper role).

A SONG FOR JULIE, which should be music in arabesques because of the presence of dancers Anton Dolin and Alicia Markova.

AT UNITED ARTISTS:

SPELLBOUND, with Ingrid Bergman, Gregory Peck and John Emery.

HIGH AMONG THE STARS, with dimpled Jane Powell, saturnine Arthur Treacher, and lovable Louise Beavers.

HOLD AUTUMN IN YOUR HAND, the story of Texas farmers and their struggles to elicit production from 60 acres of river bottom land, has Zachary Scott and Betty Field in the lead with deadpan Percy Kilbride likely to catch them in the stretch.

IT'S IN THE BAG is also in the gag—courtesy of Fred Allen, Binnie Barnes, and John Carradine, a recent bridegroom who liked his wife so well that he married her twice in succession.

AT UNIVERSAL:

SALOME, WHERE SHE DANCED introduces the spectacular Canadian girl, Yvonne De Carlo, who was selected because she sang, she was an accomplished ballet dancer, and she could ride horseback. The picture is being shot in Technicolor, and Salome in the title has reference primarily to a small western town by that name.

FAIRY TALE MURDER is Gloria Jean's current picture; story deals with a girl who has been vigorously sheltered from knowledge of the world outside her home by an uncle, John Qualen. Her introduction to the wickedness of portions of mankind is by way of murder, drastic but dramatic. Romantic lead was won by a newcomer with the impressive label Keefe Brasselle.

THE SUSPECT is another psychological murder chiller, directed by the man who gave you "The Phantom Lady"—Robert Siodmak. Cast includes Charles Laughton, Ella Raines, Dean Harens, and Henry Daniell.

AT WARNERS:

OF HUMAN BONDAGE is still in production, with Paul Henreid, Eleanor Parker, Alexis Smith, Patric Knowles and Edmund Gwenn.

PILLAR TO POST, with Ida Lupino, Sydney Greenstreet, and William Prince, also introduces 6'4" Johnny Mitchell, who is a frightful problem to the hairdressers. While working in a wind scene, the director asked the hairdresser why better care was not taken of the Mitchell hair, which was

"Every new mother will know what I mean!"

"I worried about the weight I put on after the baby came. Then I discovered a practical way to regain my slender figure," says Mrs. Lois Cameron of Chicago, Ill.

Before

After

Lois Cameron had three problems. She needed more energy to take care of her sturdy baby. She wanted to lose the 20 pounds she had put on after her baby was born. And she needed something that would keep up her morale after her husband had gone into the service.

"The DuBarry Success Course answered all my problems," says Mrs. Cameron. "I lost 16 pounds in 6 weeks; since then, have lost 4 more. I have so much vitality that I feel I have been reborn! And what a surprise for my returning husband when he finds me slim again!"

Waist 3½ inches smaller, and hips 4 inches smaller, she now wears a size 12 instead of 16. Her skin is softer, finer in texture; her hair shows improvement.

As a result of years of swimming, Lois Cameron had developed an athletic figure. Usually, that means hard-to-lose pounds. But "eating as a beauty eats" and fun-to-do exercises reduced her weight from 136 to 116—just right for her 5 feet 2. Happy Lois Cameron says: "I'm living the DuBarry way of life!"

Be Yourself at Your Best!

Yes, every mother knows what Lois Cameron means. For added weight "after the baby comes" only makes you tired at the very time you want to feel your best. Thousands of mothers have found the DuBarry Success Course a simple, practical way to lose unwanted pounds, gain vital energy, improve skin and hair, look and feel like a new person. More than 150,000 women and girls have followed this plan in making the most of themselves. DREAMS began to come true for this unusually gifted young star this year, largely because she has learned to adapt herself to situations as well as to people.

At birth, her Sun in the fiery, idealistic sign Sagittarius and her Moon in the feminine, emotional sign Cancer indicated high nervous tension with an extremely receptive mentality, since Mercury, the Planet of the mind, is in close conjunction to her Sun and in favorable position to Neptune, the Planet of intuition.

Born with a deep respect for education, she has never neglected to study and learn. There are several indications that, with understanding cooperation or the right partnership, she will sooner or later supprise us with some very interesting literary contribution of her own.

Hers is a calm and penetrating view of living, although because she is sometimes living "on edge" there are swift reactions and short-lived angers. Her enthusiasm and alertness conceal a most mental attitude to the glories of her profession, especially such heady glories as popularity. She wants no popularity based on outward appearance alone; whatever of it she will accept is that which is due to her (Continued on page 89)

for those persons born between Nov. 24 and Dec. 23

THIS should have been an outstanding year of personal achievement for those people born under the sign Sagittarius, bringing an entirely new understanding of themselves and of living, through new and unusual contacts with interesting people and unexpected situations.

It was far from smooth going all the way, and many a hurdle has been almost too high to take. But you have certainly developed the ability to be quiet and wait instead of giving in to your usually impetuous temperament. If you have been entirely honest with the other fellow, you have gained greatly. If not, even with the best of advice, your losses have proved that honesty in everything is the only course a Sagittarian may safely follow.

Things moved slowly until August, when something was started on your own and made a good financial advancement in spite of the fact that others tried to get all the glory. It was a good time to make that change, then or September, as you now realize. October was a double-barrelled time, with things coming and going as rapidly, but the profit outweighed the loss, for the gain was yours by right of hard work and personal enterprise. Secret planning though November and December should find you well set, so cut expenses and don't be overconfident. 1945 is coming along fast, and promises to bring you much more advencement as well as a big and better change of residence, employment, or affairs of the heart.

They consulted the manager, who suggested that they get in touch with the apartment owner. Alexis telephoned the number given and had begun her explanation when the deep voice of the apartment owner asked, "What did you say your name was?"

"Alexis Smith—or Alexis Stevens, I should say."

The voice laughed. "This is Fred MacMurray," he said.

Ann Sheridan . . . A MISS ON A MISSION

"She's a super duper
This G.I. trouper . . ."
So say the men in the forces

By JOE GOOTER

A MODERN Aladdin bearing gifts of entertainment, Ann Sheridan soared off to distant lands on a magic carpet (C-46 version) to write a wondrous saga for eight weeks. No magic lamp was rubbed to make it come true—just a green light given her by the USO.

A USO Camp Show entertainment trip to the CBI Theater. Take it from Annie, the CBI Theater is not a new radio network! Those magic initials stand for China-Burma-India, and represent a lot of sweating, sacrificing, homesick American heroes in uniform, many of whom have been in service two years and longer, and this was their first show.

With Ann on the tour went Ben Blue, movie comedian; Jackie Miles, Broadway funmaker; Mary Landa, dancer; and Ruth Denas, accordionist-singer. Actually theirs was not the first unit assigned to the CBI Theater, but only two troupes had been there before them—Joe E. Brown's outfit and the show headed by Paulette Goddard—and don't forget, there's a lot of territory to be covered. No one troupe could possibly get to all those difficult-to-reach and farflung places, some of which are hardly more than unidentified dots on a war map.

After traveling 60,000 miles, playing in Casablanca (from the picture of the same name), Oran, Algiers, Cairo, two weeks in India, flying over The Hump (the Himalayas) into China, and from there to the Burma jungles, Ann arrived back in New York on September 6, flashing the famous Sheridan smile, and saying, "Gee, it was swell. Only getting back after a trip like ours isn't the big thrill that it might be, because you wish your own homecoming could be shared by all those men overseas."

Not a word of complaint about the rigors of traveling minus civilization's comforts—only this: "It's good to be back where there are toilets that flush!"

And apologies for the rainstorm which greeted her arrival back in the States drew the Sheridan light touch of dismissal: "Oh, this couldn't bother me. Not after the weather I've seen!"

Janie's name is Joyce

She's Joyce Reynolds, college co-ed who took a career instead

BY MARION
COOPER

JOYCE REYNOLDS came to Movietown from Texas, but not for the usual reason. She came, if you please, for a college education!

Although she's just nineteen, Joyce is one of the most level-headed, poised young women in Hollywood. She's been here three years, and she has yet to attend her first Hollywood party. She's heiress to a sizeable tract of land deep in the heart of you-know-where.

But shouldn't we start at the beginning?

The beginning was in San Antonio, where she was born Helen Joyce Reynolds. From all accounts she was anything but the little angel you'd naturally, ex-

Under contract for only two years, Joyce is already fan-rated "the Hollywood hit girl."

It might be a scene from her current movie, "Hollywood Canteen." But no—these are GI Joes who met Joyce at Mitchel Field.

Highlight of her recent N. Y. trip was a visit to LaGuardia. And the wings she wears? They were given to her by a Marine.

The "Junior Miss", and cast for the role of the same name. Born in Texas, and she hopes to own a ranch there someday.

Joyce is an "outdoor girl" in the real sense, not just for the benefit of the studio photographer. She also fishes and hunts.

Back to school, but just to visit! Joyce and Solly Biano, Warner Bros. talent scout responsible for "discovering" her. She was enrolled as a student at U.C.L.A., at the time; a dramatics major.

pect, judging from her so sweet 'n demure appearance.

She was a little devil in school, always talking and disrupting the class. Joyce thinks it was her memory of how she made her own teachers suffer that discouraged any ambitions she might have had for teaching as her own career.

Her mother wanted her to work toward a degree for teaching when she enrolled at U.C.L.A., but Joyce would have none of it. And when Miss Reynolds makes up her mind, you might as well know, it stays that way!

"No," she told her mother, "that's out. That's settled. Let's not talk about it."

She majored in dramatics instead.

Which proved to be a wise choice, because she was discovered by a Warner Brothers talent scout while playing Alice in a school production of "Alice in Wonderland."

It was only after she was tested, and offered a contract, that Joyce suddenly discovered she had a yen for the movies. And then that little maker-up-of-minds made up her mind once more.

"I'll give an acting career three years," she decided. "Then if nothing very special happens, I'll go back to college."

Of course plenty did happen, as you know—"Yankee Doodle Dandy," "George Washington Slept Here," "The Constant Nymph," and "Janie." (And she's been under contract only two years.) As if that weren't enough, she'll play "Junior Miss" very soon.

Joyce likes to tell how she got the part of Paula in "The Constant Nymph," her first important role. She was assisting another young actress who was testing for the part of Toni in the same picture, when Director Edmund Goulding decided he'd like to test Joyce, right then and there.

"There was no time to study the part," she says, "so Mr. Goulding told me just to go ahead and talk about anything. I said the only thing I could think of:

'I'm testing for Paula in 'The Constant Nymph.'

"The funny part was, I wasn't the least bit nervous. I guess the honest truth is I knew so little about acting then that I just didn't know enough to be nervous."

But getting the plum role of Janie was quite a different story. She made test after test for it, and so did a number of other promising young actresses. The only reason Joyce wasn't nervous then was because she was positive she hadn't a chance in the world of ever winning the part.

If there's one thing that does make her nervous, however, it's having to make a personal appearance—especially since something that happened on her last visit to Texas.

"I made an appearance at a Canteen," Joyce said, "and when I stood up to face the boys I got the jitters. For a minute I couldn't think of a thing to say. Then I had an inspiration. I beamed on them and said: 'Hello, all you wonderful Texas people. I'm so happy to be back with my own home folks.'

"Every face froze," Joyce said. "I could feel the chill, and I stopped dead. I couldn't understand it at first, and then suddenly light dawned. Not one of the boys was a Texan. They were just stationed there!"

Joyce has better luck with her own service man, who is a Texan. He's First Lieutenant Robert F. Lewis, a Marine flier in the South Pacific.

Bob is from Houston, where Joyce did the major part of her growing-up—but oddly enough they didn't meet until a year ago, when Bob was stationed in Southern California.

"Bob's cousin is one of my best friends," Joyce explains, "and when she came out here to visit her Marine husband, she brought him and Bob over one evening. We went out on a double date, just four Texans seeing the town. As a matter of fact, I made my first visit to the Mocambo with them that night.

"Bob and I didn't pay much attention to each other that first evening—or even on our second double date, a week later. It took a month for us to fall in love."

Now Joyce and Bob—who is six-feet-two, with blond wavy hair, and just one year older than she is—are "unofficially" engaged.

They haven't seen each other since January, when he went overseas, but Bob has taken good care that Joyce won't forget him. ("As if I could!" Joyce will tell you.) Before he left he placed a standing order with a local florist. Every month a large bouquet of roses arrives with his card.

It will be time enough to think about marriage, Joyce feels, when the war is over. She's reconciled, meanwhile, to their separation. "It's always been like that," she says wistfully. "All my romances leave town. Either the Army takes them away, or they go back to school."

Always before, she took that matter-of-factly. She makes no bones about it's being different this time. This time she's positive it's the real thing, not just "puppy love."

But while she's waiting she concentrates on career. Joyce loves her work. To her the studio spells excitement, and she never becomes bored. Even after two years as an actress, she finds Hollywood glamorous. "Something's always happening," she says. "New people to meet, or new parts coming up. It never gets dull."

She's still wide-eyed at meeting celebrities, still very much a fan. As a matter of fact, she spends much of her free time at the movies. Whether a picture is good, bad or indifferent, you never have any trouble persuading Joyce to sit through a four-hour (Continued on page 82)

She visited the world's tallest teepee (the Empire State Building), as would any other tourist seeing N. Y. for the first time; and met the late Al Smith.

At least a lot of people thought it was Adolf Hitler for quite some time, and phoned anonymous tips to the FBI, the Sheriff's office and the county cops—which all caused Robert Watson no end of trouble.

"Finally," said Watson, "I just kept out of sight. Small boys were throwing rocks at me, my friends yelled 'Heil, Hitler!' while giving the Nazi salute, and total strangers threatened to punch me right in the nose or commit other bodily harm."

It wasn't the first time that Watson, a native of Springfield, Ill., a student of Lincoln, and a former stage comedian, had portrayed Hitler on the screen. But it was just about the first time he had done it so seriously, intently and completely.

"About three years ago at a party at Malibu," he explains, "I combed my hair down over one eye, put on a false mustache, yelled a lot of double talk that could have been German, and seemed to amuse some of my friends. In particular, there was the son of a newspaper publisher there. He insisted on taking my picture and getting it printed in the paper.

UNMASKING FRANCHOT TONE

CUSTOMERS in the quiet Sunset Boulevard tearoom could scarcely eat their luncheon. For there at a table in a corner sat Franchot Tone, wearing a coat with a torn sleeve, his clothes wrinkled as if they'd been drenched and had dried on him, his hair on end, and two black eyes!

You know Franchot. He's the high-silk-hat, suave sophisticate, immaculately groomed from the top of his dark head to the heel of his shining shoes. The tearoom buzzed with speculation.

The object of curiosity read a book and ate his leisurely way through a vegetable plate. Apparently he didn't feel the eyes upon him. When he'd finished, he went out with his usual detached air, and the buzzing became louder.

It just goes to show you how convincing skillful make-up can be!

Franchot was working in the swamp sequence of "Dark Waters," Ben Bogeaus' production, in which the actor and Merle Oberon are in and out of water for days and are badly beaten by a band of ruffians. The black eyes were temporarily applied for that purpose.

And that's a sample of what Hollywood doesn't know about Franchot. He's been in (Continued on page 74)

Dear Friends:

This is the last time I'll be replying to your letters in Movieland. I've been busy making personal appearances at camp shows and military hospitals; now my future schedule calls for a tour of the country to visit our wounded servicemen.

Please understand how it is—how one has to choose, when there just isn't time to do everything.

Thanks for your fine cooperation during the past year. Being your advice counselor has given me a rich, full experience—one I'll not soon forget, believe me.

All the very best wishes from Your sincere friend.

YOUR PROBLEM AND MINE

By Bonita Granville

INTRODUCING: Your new problem page editor, Jane Wyman! Not that a good friend like Jane needs any introduction, but we just want you to know that you can keep your questions coming—care Movieland, 9126 Sunset Blvd., L. A. 46, Calif.—and starting next month, you'll be answered by—Jane Wyman!

Dear Miss Granville:

Mine is a personal as well as family problem. You see, although I am only fifteen, I know my life's ambition is to become an actor. I have acted in many school plays and want to go to dramatic school when I graduate from high school. But my father thinks it is all ridiculous, and that I should go to college instead.

Also, we are devoutly religious, and he says no one can lead a religious life in Hollywood as an actor. Is this true?

Sincerely Yours,
Leon

Dear Leon:

First of all, are you sure you really possess the necessary ambition and talent to become an actor after intensive study and experience, or are you merely enthralled with the idea, as many young people today become? In any event, a college education would only help you become a better actor as well as a better person. It can never hinder your career.

As far as religion is concerned, perhaps you can point out to your father that religion plays a very important part in the lives of most actors and actresses in Hollywood, as well as in New York. I know this to be a fact.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Bonita:

In my outfit there are a lot of us soldiers who have just returned to the front from furloughs home, and who have found out a very unhappy truth. Our girl friends are no more. In short, they have given us up for a bunch of civilians and camp commandos who are on the spot to press their case, and that lets us out just beautifully.

I know there isn't anything you can do about this problem, but we just thought we would like to know your opinions on the subject.

Unhappily,
John T.

Dear John:

Needless to say, this is a problem that worries me very much. There is not very much I can say that will do any good. However, it seems to me that the really nice girls, even though they are under a difficult and confusing emotional strain these days, will not stray off the path they have chosen to follow with you boys. Never forget there are many of these girls waiting for you to come home—maybe not the same one you are thinking about now—but nice girls will be here for you when you get back. Also, don't let your emotions run away with you. There is a certain enchantment about letters that often tends to cause one to take too much for granted.

In the long run, John, trite though this may sound, you are certainly better off without the girl, if she is the kind who would jilt you without giving you a fighting chance.

Good luck.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Miss Granville:

I guess my problem should come under the heading of Beauty, because it concerns my eyes.

They are nice enough as far as eyes go, but they are too small for the size of my face. I am extremely sensitive about this fact, and have tried very many ways to overcome it, but there doesn't seem to be much I can do about it.

Could you recommend some kind of make-up that I could use to correct this feature—in a small way, at least?

Sincerely,
Helen

Dear Helen:

First of all, don't make up your eyes or your face too heavily. This would only accentuate this feature, rather than hide it. Never mascara your lower lashes. Try and diminish the size of your lips by following the smallest natural line rather than following the supposed accepted fashion of larger lips. By doing this, your face will conform to more normal lines, and the eyes will not appear unduly small.

Try this, and let me know your results.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Bonita:

I am in the Marines and located near a large city, and during my free time I want to try and meet some nice, decent girls to spend my leaves with. But that is really a problem for us fellows, because we would really like to meet girls like the ones we left back in our home towns, but they just don't seem to be available around here.

Can you suggest any way I can meet such nice girls?

James

Dear James:

I would advise you to enter into activities in your nearest church group during your next leave, for there is bound to be a young people's group actively working in the church. Also, frequent your local U.S.O., for they, too, are particular in choosing the young girls who act as hostesses.

Remember that there are many young girls today who are looking for nice young men; it is just a matter of not becoming impatient.

I admire your attitude in this matter, and do believe you will one day find the right girl.

Sincerely,
BG

Dear Miss Granville:

Although I am only fourteen, I am considered quite grown-up, and am in love with a boy I have known all my life. He lives on the next block, and is nineteen, and is joining the Navy soon.

But my mother thinks I should not go out yet, and certainly should not be seriously interested in him because he is five years older than I.

I know he likes me an awful lot, so what should I do about it?

Betty

Dear Betty:

I think your mother is right. I wasn't allowed to go out at fourteen, and certainly not with a boy five years older!

Perhaps, having grown up with him, you have a great affection for him that is really a Big Brother feeling, and you don't realize it. Why not try and see it in this light, and write to him when he is in the service, but make the letters the kind you would write to an older brother.

Try this and see if your problem can be solved.

Sincerely,
BG

Books that look read, fireplaces that are invitingly cozy; every room decorated and arranged in comfortable good taste.

Born in St. John, New Brunswick, "Pidge" is 6' 3", got his first break in show business when Elsie Janis needed a singing partner, followed with a series of Broadway musicals. He refuses singing pictures now but still vocalizes at home.

His special hobbies: Backgammon (played here with Rupert Lucas, CBS producer and personal friend) and the arts. He's an authority and a collector; has many rare paintings in his home.

His being "the man who smokes a pipe" has been much exaggerated, Pidgeon says, though he admits having two favorite pastimes—pipe-smoking and gardening—and feels that the two go naturally together, somehow.

One of the most popular men's men in Hollywood, he's still an adventurer at heart. Has a yen to sail a boat to distant ports, post-war.

Going over a radio script (Pidgeon frequently appears as a guest star on CBS shows), with this pretty red-headed secretary to take notes on corrections he wants made. On contract to MGM, his current picture is "Mrs. Parkington", with Greer Garson.

Oranges right in his own back yard! A profusion of flowers, too. in Pidgeon's Beverly Hills garden. He had snapdragons last season soaring seven feet high. Seems like a tall tale, but it's a fact!

The charm of these Spanish-style homes is that every ground-floor room opens out of doors, either onto a garden or a tiled patio. Pidgeon is a sun-worshiper, which is one reason he deserted Broadway for Hollywood.

BEFORE the war, famed Paris couturiers were acknowledging the importance of Hollywood as a style-setting center gaining prominence in the fashion world—because Hollywood had Irene. And Irene was attracting many of the international set clientele who'd formerly made Paris their shopping center.

Today, Irene devotes her attention exclusively to costuming motion picture stars—Lana Turner, Greer Garson, Hedy Lamarr, Irene Dunne, Marlene Dietrich, Laraine Day and other "big names" on the M-G-M lot. The contract she signed in July of 1942 gives her complete authority for the costuming of a picture; she designs wardrobes for the entire cast, from stars down to the most (Continued on page 86)

Dane Clark ("The Very Thought of You") studied to be a lawyer, took and passed his bar examination, then decided he liked acting better.

WHEN I'M A

Every Hollywood career is hitched to the dream of one day being a star. The wish is the same in every case, yet the ends are quite as varied as the means.

NEVER has there been a time when Hollywood looked more hopefully at her younger players. War and maternity have made inroads into every studio's acting talent, and building new stars has become imperative.

Maybe they won't all be stars, but their chances weigh heavily.

So what will this younger set do when names go up in lights and paychecks approach four figures?

Ideas range from Dane Clark's flippant: "I want to be able to make reservations for dinner at Romanoff's!" to Zachary Scott's thoughtful: "I want to start the Federal Theatre movement again."

"A lot of my money and time would go to the Federal Theatre," Zachary says. "I have connections in New York who would help, and I'd like to meet picture people who would be interested. In recent years in New York only people with good incomes—sophisticated (Continued on page 68)

John Garfield could give Bob Hutton tips about Hollywood; he's been there longer.

Eddie
Bracken

SOB STORIES are written about underprivileged boys who, lacking education and advantages, get into the big money through various shenanigans and proceed to step from there into trouble.

Eddie Bracken might have fitted into that pattern. You know Eddie—he's that crazy kid who's currently slaying his public in "Hail, the Conquering Hero."

Eddie was born at Astoria, Long Island, to parents who had to count every penny. Two older brothers crowded the cramped family quarters when he arrived, and the problem of feeding five seemed all but impossible of solution. The Brackens got along just "somehow."

At three, Eddie was an altar boy. He wasn't beautiful but his impudent little face, twinkling eyes and beaming smile arrested attention, especially when coupled with his high soprano.

He was a knockout in his first amateur play. One Jack Noble, seeing him, persuaded the Brackens to let him take the four-year-old to the coast to appear in the first Our Gang comedy.

This was in the days of Sunshine Sammy, before Joe Cobb and Farina took over. Eddie was a miniature gangster for three months, before returning to New York to join an outfit called Kiddie Troupers.

Nobody seems to know how (Continued on page 83)

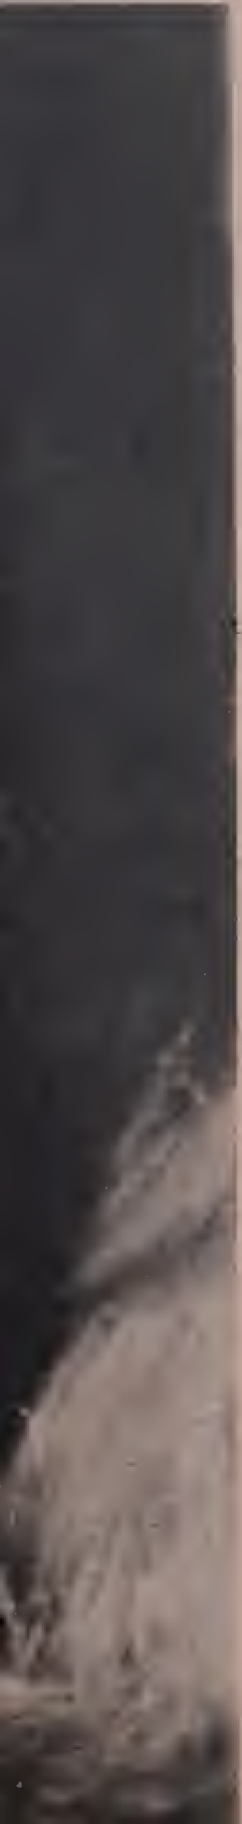
Presenting

BY VARINA ALLEN

• • LAUREN BACALL



SHE gave herself ten years to become a star.

"In ten years," sixteen-year-old Miss Bacall observed to her mirror, "you'll either get somewhere, or you'll get OUT!"

Even at sixteen she was a girl who knew what she wanted, so it's not surprising that she's creating a flurry in Hollywood before her twentieth birthday. When "To Have And Have Not," in which she makes her screen debut, was sneak-previewed, the audience reacted with excited whispers: "Who is she?" "What's her name?" "Where'd she come from?" More important: producers threw up figurative hats, drew up new contracts, and began sending wires demanding a speed-up campaign for the "greatest discovery since Greta Garbo."

Lauren has the sort of face you can't forget. It's not classically beautiful but it's extremely photogenic. Her hair is a combination of ash, pale gold, light brown, plus a strand or so of chestnut. She won't have it bleached. Her eyebrows are darker, with an odd crook in them which she refuses to have changed. Her teeth are slightly irregular, and she intends to leave them that way.

"I want to be ME!" she declared. "This is the way I look!"

Her eyes are long and gray-green with untouched-up lashes; her mouth is well-shaped, generous and expressive; she has acquired a creamy tan.

Oh, what's the use? In the course of five minutes she bewilders you as to which is the real "ME." Is she the straight-forward, honest young American girl? Is she the woman of mystery? Is she the coltish school-girl, all long slim legs, slender arms and blowing hair? Or the graceful, poised, ageless creature who knows all the answers?

Ever since Lauren can remember, her mother has worked. Because she wasn't on hand to make decisions for her daughter, she encouraged her child to make them for herself.

Lauren can't remember when she didn't want to act. As a child (she was Betty Bacall then—"Lauren" is a family name adopted with her screen career) Bette Davis was her idol. She saw every Bette Davis film, planned to see her in person some day, to be like her.

"I don't want to be another Bette," she points out, however. "We're not the same type, and I'm not 'another' anybody. But I want to be as good as Miss Davis, if I can."

A native of New York City, Lauren attended private schools, graduating from Julia Richman High School at the age of fifteen. She dreamed of enrolling at the American Academy of Dramatic Arts in her home town, but that, she supposed,

"The greatest find since Greta Garbo" . . . "The most interesting face on the screen"

Action speaks louder than words, believes Lionel Barrymore, explaining this by-hand application of his Happy Birthday greeting.

Buster Keaton minds his manners—yes, wherever! But was he a bathing beauty, or just a bather? He refused to say.

"Who, me?" asks the lady fair. Kibitzing Ish Kabibble's proposal are Wally Pierce, Mrs. "Ish," Mary Lou Dix, and Betty Kern.

"Oh, you wonderful mon!" It's Arthur Treocher (in grondmo's nightie, yet!) getting the coy-oct from his hostess.

Position's everything in life. (Can you spot the block-out tooth?) Reody for the rescue, boot ond oll, is Ish Kobibble.

Enter the villoin, Francis Lederer. (He never did explain why the umbrello.) "Not this lovely moid!" says Hero Chorlie.

Forewell if she does (if Wolly Pierce doesn't stop her), and better—for better—for the cherry-colored toffeto "bathing costume," if she doesn't. "Stoy 'woy from the woter, dotter" . . . and now we know why!

Gay... but not Ninety!

LUCILLE BALL celebrated her birthday (we won't mention numbers), and the completion of her role in "Ziegfeld Follies," with a Gay Nineties swimming party. The guests all came in suits strictly suitable, as you can see—all save Charlie Ruggles. (Who claimed he was too bashful!)

The fun lasted all day—with swimming (in these outfits? But why not!) and dancing, and then at midnight, a barbecue.

About the MGM "Follies," though—it's that musical without a story, but with so many "names" in the cast that the list reads like a Hollywood Who's Who! Lucille does a number called "Meet the Ladies," with Fred Astaire, and another, "Glorifying the American Girl," with a song ensemble.

Add note about that last item: George Petty, ranking as an authority on said very glorious subject, was brought to Hollywood for advice-rendering purposes. Queried about his assignment, Petty said, "They don't need glorifying; I'm just here to bring them down to earth!"

Going the rounds, too, is Lucille's quip about her whip (the diamond-studded whip she cracks as the ringmaster in the Merry-go-round number). Did she learn the technique from some South American gaucho? "No," says the lady, "from the Hollywood wolves!"

MOVIELAND'S

FIVE BEST PICTURES OF THE MONTH

MORE of a philosophical character study than is usual in films, this is the story of Ernie Mott, a cockney English boy who strives to find happiness in his sordid world. He spends his life as a wanderer, owing no man, and reveling in his freedom from the world and its petty troubles. Coming home after one of those nomad spells, though, he has sharp words with his mother, when she hints that he should stay at home and help her with her shop. Angered by this threat to his independence, even as it's merely suggested, he is about to leave once more; but is made to change his mind, when he learns that his mother is ill and has but a short time to live.

Ernie Mott stays home, then; helps about the shop, falls in love with a girl, and is on the verge of becoming a settled man with a secure future, when he's suddenly sickened by the efforts of those about him to keep body and soul together.

His life is finally shaken, then—by the death of his mother, and by the infidelity of his girl.

Ethel Barrymore and Cary Grant, as the mother and son, give two of the most impressive performances ever drawn on the screen. June Duprez, Barry Fitzgerald and Jane Wyatt are superb. The film is "different," involving considerable legitimate stage technique in its effects; it's deeply stirring and highly recommended.

NONE BUT THE LONELY HEART

(RKO)

A SONG TO REMEMBER

(Columbia)

TAKING the title literally, there's much more than a song to be remembered, after seeing this Technicolored screen story of the Life of Chopin.

There's the memory re-created of a gay, music-loving Paris; of composers like Franz Liszt (Stephen Bekassy) who, in addition to contributing their own music, were helpful in contributing what was offered by the unrecognized newcomers, like Frederic Chopin (Cornel Wilde).

But more important than the fine music—which would, of course, be expected—the picture makes a strong appeal for our remembering that there was an oppressed Poland of an earlier day . . . and that then, as now, there were brave patriots willing to fight, and die if need be, for their "cause."

Wilde makes a sensitive, altogether satisfying and delightful Chopin, even challenging Paul Muni (who plays the music teacher role of old Prof. Elsner) for first honors. This reviewer is inclined to be less liberal with praise for Merle Oberon, as George Sand (who, having acquired Wilde's love via the salon route, insists on dominating his life to the excluson of all else). It's possible, though, that for being a much prettier Sand, Miss Oberon feels she must try to keep the similarity illusion convincing by being more then necessarily stern and gruff-voiced and stiffly (though nonetheless beautifully) disagreeable.

RARELY does an unknown, as yet unidentified screen player (like Lauren Bacall) make a story by an established and popularly acclaimed writer (like Ernest Hemingway) such a strictly incidental vehicle that audiences come away saying, "That girl—she's wonderful!" while having only this to say of the picture, "Yes, there were some good lines."

Nevertheless, that's what happens here. And with the able, as usually dependable help of Humphrey Bogart, who's once again "the tough guy with a good heart."

The part for Miss Bacall didn't really exist, as Hemingway wrote it. In all fairness, though, it should be mentioned that the author's "skillful touches" survive the rewriting for the screen version and, if not ever-present, are at any rate responsible for giving a certain flavor to "all this and Bacall, too."

The romance which develops between Bacall and the Bogart, in these dimly lighted, suspenseful scenes laid on the island of Martinique, deals strictly with fundamentals; the repartee that flies between them makes for a lot of appreciative laughs. The cop and robber incidents that pass for a plot are more or less usual—nevertheless, it's good moviemaking, with innumerable little vignettes like Hoagy Carmichael's scenes at the bar-room piano, the rummy Eddie (Walter Brennan) jerking his way up the docks, and . . . but didn't we say, they're innumerable!

TO HAVE AND HAVE NOT

(Warner Bros.)

FRENCHMAN'S CREEK

(Paramount)

COME aboard the good ship Romantic Adventure! Let your fancy run free—free as Daphne du Maurier's when she wrote this novel that tempts us all into the land of merry escapism, and as Joan Fontaine's, when she decided she'd like to be "the Frenchman's" screen heroine.

Which she is: the beauteous English matron in the time of good King Charles, who fell romantically and daringly in love with a French Pirate (Arturo de Cordova).

The picture tells the story more or less faithfully, though with less emphasis on the boudoir.

It's diverting—at times, almost disconcerting—having the Fontaine we've known best through "Rebecca" and "The Constant Nymph" suddenly kick up her heels, don a red wig and a lavish wardrobe, and go off in a dizzying cloud of brave deeds and sword fights. But for all that her previous roles have called upon her fine ability to emote, this assignment requires that she be a beautiful actress. And for that, too, she most definitely qualifies!

His coming to Hollywood from Mexican pictures would seem, for de Cordova, to have been for the express purpose of being this dashing, derring-do pirate. (There couldn't have been a better reason!) And Nigel Bruce, Basil Rathbone and Cecil Kellaway are assuredly good "others in the picture" selections.

GREER GARSON and Walter Pidgeon are once more teamed together, giving in "Mrs. Parkington" one of their finest-yet joint performances.

Miss Garson, as you may have suspected, is the 84-year-old Mrs. P.—wealthy widow of the ruthless yet charming Major Parkington. The film covers the space of only one night, during which the grand old lady discovers that her children and grandchildren are weak, spineless parasites, spoiled to rottenness by the fortune Major Parkington left behind him at his death. Through a series of flash-backs, you are shown the romance of the Major and the Mrs., who meet in a small mining town when the Major was starting his rise to power as a financial tycoon, and when his future wife was the daughter of the owner of a tumble-down boarding house.

Miss Garson gives a splendid performance in every scene—from the time she was a frightened, naive young girl, up through the years to her portrayal of the poised, delightfully wise old woman. Pidgeon is excellent as the dashing Major, Agnes Moorehead is delightful as the Major's French mistress, Cecil Kellaway walks away with honors (and rightly so) in his portrayal of Prince Edward; and Gladys Cooper, as the disillusioned daughter, would "steal the picture," in a cast not so already star-studded.

MRS. PARKINGTON

(M-G-M)

He's Irish as the Blarney Stone, is Kevin O'Shea—but he can cook a lot of other things beside Irish Stew

Cooking - WITH GAS

BY MAUDE CHEATHAM

BORN in Chicago but thoroughly Irish, Kevin O'Shea is six feet one, has dark brown hair and eyes, weighs 170 pounds. Sure and he's as handsome as any Son o' Erin who ever set foot on American soil!

Surprisingly enough, though, he's still a bachelor. Keeps house for himself—and cooks for himself, too!

Maybe you'll find that hard to believe, having seen him in 20th Century-Fox's "The Purple Heart" and "Wing And a Prayer," but as an actor this O'Shea guy is also a darned good cook.

If it's proof you want, what about these O'Shea specialties? Try them, and you'll find you are "cooking with gas."

First, there is his Veal a la Killarney, an O'Shea concoction named for Kevin's mother who was born and raised at Killarney, in Ireland's green County Kerry. You make Veal a la Killarney like this:

Cut veal steaks into pieces about an inch square;—any cut of veal will do. Roll the squares in flour and brown in butter.

Slice and fry slightly four or five onions and place in a heavy iron frying pan—or a Dutch Oven—along with the meat.

Add four or five peeled and quartered tomatoes, six or eight cloves, several bay leaves, salt and pepper, and last of all, beer—enough to cover; a very small amount of Guinesses Stout may be added along with the beer, but it is not necessary.

Simmer the whole about an hour and a half, occasionally stirring.

Serve with new potatoes.

For Veal a la Killarney he cuts the steak in inch-square pieces.

The squares are rolled in flour then browned in a pan of butter.

Onions are fried with the meat, then he transfers to a stew pot.

Potatoes are added and four or five peeled, quartered tomatoes.

Salt and pepper to season, add cloves, bay leaves, and—beer!

Simmered about 1½ hours, the dish is ready to serve.

A MISS ON A MISSION

Karachi, India, she was caught in a four-day monsoon, and in Abadan, on the Persian Gulf, the troupe sweltered in 135-degree heat.

"Actually, we were lucky," explains the beauteous Miss GI Pollyanna. "Our being forced down then with motor trouble was at five o'clock in the morning, when it was comparatively cool. The temperature there has been known to reach 180, and the place is swept constantly by wind and sand. The men stationed in that area work only at night and head for shelter as soon as the sun comes up."

They drink no water that hasn't been boiled (and is often still hot when they drink it).

"That's why I considered I'd really done something," she says, "when General Stilwell, saying he'd liked our show and complimenting us on it, promised he'd see that ships would be made available for more entertainment—and, for more beer.

"You see, that's what those boys over there miss most—beer. After months of being where there are no facilities for making or importing ice, a cool drink is just a mirage to them."

But they take it all—all the privations and inconveniences and hardships—with typical American good humor, even making fun of their gripes.

As was demonstrated in Burma, where the lovely Warner Bros. "doughgirl" discovered that the GI gags sometime take an inventive twist!

Greeted as the first feminine visitors to be entertained in that area (many of the boys hadn't seen a white woman in more than ten months), Miss Sheridan and her party were the inspiration for the erection of a small bamboo hut, draped with burlap sacking and marked "Girls' Powder Room." And tacked up prominently on the wall inside was a charcoal drawing, an exactly detailed replica of the Chic Sales construction itself, with the caption: Ann Sheridan sat here!

You think they want glamour? Listen to this:

"I said something a few times to the boys, apologizing for not being properly glamorous. You're too much on the run to be able to manage what you think they're expecting—an in-person Hollywood pin-up girl. Even getting a shower is plenty complicated, when there's only the bucket variety, where somebody has to stand by and hold the bucket.

"So, I tried to explain, feeling pretty guilty about the whole thing—not even being able to use make-up, most of the time. 'We prefer you this way,' they told me. 'After all, back home, we saw our mothers and sisters and girlfriends without make-up, too.'"

It's a real satisfaction, performing for audiences like that. They really get into the spirit of the thing. The men would fire so many audience-participation quips at Jackie Miles, as he put on his act, that the comedian was more than once prompted to come back with, "I thought they told me I was going. to work alone." Or, to a laugh pulled when he didn't expect it, he'd say, "Go on . . . walk around and sound like a lot!"

The show ran an hour and a half and there was nearly 80 performances. The biggest audience was "about 5,000," and the smallest, 75—the 75 getting the same show as the 5,000.

Miss Sheridan did a couple of comedy skits, and sang—her most often requested numbers were "Amour," "Besame Mucho'" and "I'll Be Seeing You," the latter registering as the most popular because the boys like to get sentimental.

They want to laugh and enjoy gags, but they also like to wrap themselves up in a sad song, something that "reminds them of home."

No audience was considered too small, getting back to that talking about numbers. The troupe frequently went miles out of their way—detouring from their regular camp-to-camp circuit—to visit hospitals and entertain the wounded who weren't able to leave their beds.

Long trips between shows would be made by air and the shorter hops, in a jeep.

"You'll never know what torture is," Ann laughs, "till you ride a Chinese road in a jeep. It's so rough you can't even talk until the trip's over—and then you're not sure you want to."

But plane travel was all to her liking. Except for the trip over The Hump, that is—the stretch of the Himalaya mountains jutting into China.

"There we had to use oxygen tanks, because of the altitude and cold," she tells. "But that was nothing, I discovered later, talking to an army nurse who'd survived the experience of bailing out—not over the Himalayas, but over a stretch of not very inviting jungle."

Even after all the careful instructing of the party, in preparation for their trip, Ann isn't all sure that, had the emergency arisen, she'd not have inflated her life raft when she should have been checking her parachute!

Fortunately, neither was necessary. Thrilling as that nurse's account was, though, Ann likes even more to tell another story about the Florence Nightingales she met in the China area.

"They'd been so kind to us," she says, "and I admire them so—many of them over there for two years, and living under the same tough conditions as the men. As we were leaving, I asked what they'd like me to send them, after I got back to the States—thinking they'd want cosmetics, or stockings, or some of the many things they don't have over there and have no way of getting. But no, do you know what they asked for? Canned mince meat! It was only August then, but already they were thinking how nice it would be if they could bake mince pie for the boys, for their Christmas dinner."

One comes home with many treasured souvenirs, after such a trip. Ann has a scroll from "Uncle Joe (Stilwell) and his Dead-Enders," an assorted collection of enemy rifles, bayonets, helmets, swords and Japanese battle-flags. (The flags rate most highly on the barter market—probably because each represents an extinct Jap—the current market price being $100 in American gold."

Mementos she regrets not having been able to bring back included the many eleborately festooned cakes served at mess tables decorated in her honor. "You couldn't find anything prettier in any of our own confectionery shops."

On one occasion, the chef at a camp in the interior of China had apparently anticipated the visitors' arrival by several weeks. "It must have taken at least that long to prepare the centerpiece he had for us. Running the full length of the table was a design made from various colored dyed rice; a hand-lettered scroll of greeting, ornamented with a complicated and truly beautiful pattern of flowers."

Mentioned as her most difficult to come by souvenir is a copy of the list of instructions issued to the GI's at the camps, prior to her arrival. Typical item: "Cussing with ladies present must be reduced to a minimum and won't be allowed at a range closer than 500 yards."

To provide souvenirs for the men, Ann was kept busy signing short-snorters, repeatedly ran a pen dry in autographing every conceivable object on which her name could be written, and she promised to send a lot of pin-up pictures.

"Not of any one star," she reveals. "Just as long as the girl's pretty, the boys say she'll do for a pin-up."

Adding up to a tall figure, too, are the telephone calls she has promised to make for servicemen who asked her to say hello to their "folks back home." They cover almost every state in the union, but those calls will be made!

Most vivid impression of the trip was the troupe's nearness to the actual fighting, while giving shows for Merrill's Marauders, Stilwell's men and Chennault's Flying Tigers. "In Mytkina, Burma," Ann recalls, "we could still smell the dead Japs—and they DO SMELL!"

Summed up for what made the whole thing infinitely worthwhile is the comment one GI made, coming over to her car as she was leaving New Delhi: "This was worth waiting 29 months for, Miss Sheridan," he said.

The high point was going home at 6 P. M., when the sun was getting low and seaweed was pungent. . . . I still love that awful smell of seaweed because of the memory! . . . We'd take the trolley home and I'd be so hot, so red with sunburn, my hair so full of sand, my dad so proud and me so happy! . . . The sea and the beach had a different look when we left, empty and quiet and a little lonely, I thought, because we were leaving.

I REMEMBER

The first picture that made an impression on me. It was "Galloping Fish"—Louise Fazenda and Chester Conklin. It was so funny I was hysterical all night, and I can still laugh when I think of it. To me, Louise Fazenda is the funniest comedienne of the screen. I saw her at a party one night not long ago and thought I'd like to tell her about that picture—but I weakened.

I LOVE:

Driving up the coast to San Francisco—in the days you could get the gas;
Sundays;
Getting into a tub;
Going to dinner in odd little restaurants I've discovered myself;
Talking a lot of nonsense to people I like;
"Miracle in the Rain," "Snow Goose," "We Took to the Woods"—whatever good book I happen to be reading.

MY FIRST FAVORITE BOOK

Was "Swiss Family Robinson." I suppose we all want an island of our own, a refuge in the wilderness, a sort of Shangri-La.

I DISLIKE:

Malicious gossip;
People who want the windows closed. I'm a fiend for fresh air, like the breeze blowing in, the curtains fluttering, that grand fresh air feeling.

I'M ANNOYED BY:

People who talk in theatres when I want to enjoy the picture;
Babytalk;
Women—or men—who deliberately copy someone else, try to be another Garson or Gable. But—

I DON'T STAY ANNOYED

Things roll off the back; nothing bothers me long.

I LIKE:

To see a woman in a startling hat. I think: "She felt terribly down so she pepped herself up with that amazing hat—good girl!"
People who spend money foolishly on themselves once in a while.

It makes them feel pleasant and it's a pleasure to be with them.

I USED TO:

Dream of a house of my own. I still look at houses as I pass and say: "There's a honey—that's for me!" and mentally furnish the place. I decide to have lots of good heavy furniture, leather stuff, the bigger and heavier the better. Dark red leather, knotty pine walls, lots of bright color—everything comfortable, indestructible, to be lived in and used. . . . And then I pass my wonderful house again and think: "Now why would I burden myself with all that?" And I realize that I'm happiest with just a few—very few—possessions, and nothing on my mind.

PEOPLE ARE ALWAYS HELPING ME

For example:

Jerry Whyte, stage manager for George Abbott, used to get me into the theater at 8 A. M. and have me go through every man's part. "Think of the back row!" he'd cry. "Think of the gallery! Speak out!" He's stage manager at 20th Century-Fox now. I got frightfully mad at him sometimes in those days, but he was good for me.

Mary Martin saw me in the Rainbow Room, took the trouble to tell me I had promise and ask if I was serious about wanting to succeed. Then she got a picture contract and left, so we lost touch; but she gave me a boost when I badly needed it.

Buster West had me with him in a vaudeville act for a year. He taught me a lot I'd never have learned any other way.

June Havoc in "Pal Joey." I had had experience on the road and expected a big part in the play, but they put me in the chorus. I was furious and went in with a chip on my shoulder. June, a star, had a terrific sense of humor and showed me how to develop one.

Harry Bucquet. Until he saw me, they'd had my hair dyed dark; I felt strange and lost. He had the dye washed out and let me be myself for the first time.

Irene Dunne, Spencer Tracy, Victor Fleming, and all those lovely people who helped me when I had my accident and through the dreadful days in the hospital.

Mervyn LeRoy, who chose me for "Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo" and gave me the confidence to do the part.

I'VE LEARNED:

To like vegetables.

To enjoy radio serials—soap operas—because they helped me through my hospital stay.

To do without what I once took as a matter of course—like jumping in my car to drive miles and miles for no reason.

That Dad was right about a lot of things. He believed in the Golden Rule, in never speaking ill of anyone, in old maxims like: "Never put off till tomorrow what couldn't happen. So when her mother said, casually, one morning: "Let's run down to the Academy and see what it's all about," she thought she was still dreaming.

"On the way down, I kept telling myself I mustn't get my hopes up too high. 'It'll be one of those things—too expensive, or they won't have me,' I said," recalls Lauren. "Instead, next thing I knew I was reading for someone, and presently I was accepted."

She remained at the Academy for a year, learning stage technique, body movement, how to use her voice, and so on. Students are not given stage experience in Empire Theater matinees until the second year. Lauren was impatient. Here she was, sixteen years old, no time to waste. You learn things by doing them, don't you? Good heavens, she wasn't going to spend her life in school! She'd go on the stage and get real experience.

It was then that she informed her mirrored self that she had ten years to GET SOMEWHERE.

She pounded pavements looking for a job, visited agencies, haunted theaters. Then she decided that wasn't the way to do it. She found out when producers were casting plays and tracked them down. She'd walk after a producer on the street, catch up with him and say: "You need me!" in that low, throaty voice of hers.

When she repeated this performance with Max Gordon, he was so intrigued by the novel approach, and so pleased with the girl's unusual appearance that he gave her a role in "Franklin Street," a play he was producing at the time. The part was that of a young girl, so Lauren wore low-heeled shoes, flattened her hair, emphasized her youth. She was certain she wasn't the ingenue type, though, and when the play completed its shore run, went after roles with more character.

She had played only a few parts, with stretches of looking for jobs between, when one evening a friend took her dancing. One of the editors of a slick fashion magazine was seated at a nearby table. Presently he obtained an introduction to ask: "How would you like to do modeling for us, Miss Bacall?"

"Frankly, I'd hate it. I want to act."

The editor refused to be discouraged. Why not try modeling while she waited for the right part? It would be good money, and it might lead to something.

So Lauren finally gave in. But she hated modeling, just as much as she had thought she would. She couldn't get excited over clothes. She liked them, especially simple ones with good lines, but they weren't important to her.

Only a few issues of the magazine had carried Bacall pictures when it was decided to use the new model in a spread including Martha Scott and another actress. Since they were giving credit to the actresses, "Betty Bacall" necessarily appeared under Lauren's picture.

Out in Hollywood, Mrs. Howard Hawks, wife of the Warner Brothers' director, saw the pictures and showed them to her husband.

"Look, here's a distinctive face. You could do something with this girl if she matches it," she said, eagerly.

Mr. Hawks looked, thought there might be something there, and cautiously asked his New York contact to sound the girl out as to how she felt about the screen. He meant merely to suggest a New York screen test, when convenient.

Lauren was in Florida doing pictures for the magazine when the wire reached her. The second-hand message was confusing, and she did nothing until another wire arrived, no clearer than the first.

"I consulted Mother and we decided I'd better go out to Hollywood," Lauren tells now. "It's all very well to have directors ask about you, but I knew how busy directors are and how easy it is for busy people to forget why they asked. So I thought I'd better be on hand to remind Mr. Hawks that he needed me."

When Mr. Hawks was informed that his discovery was waiting in his office, he was horrified. Great Scott, here she was, probably expecting a contract, when all he had had in mind was a screening in New York—if that! Still, he felt he had to see her, after she'd come so far.

She was even better than her pictures. She had had stage training and experience. Mr. Hawks could scarcely believe his luck. After a screen test, he signed her to personal contract.

That was in May, 1943. The then Betty Bacall was in seventh heaven. She dashed about, looking for an apartment. She found several, all of them new, attractive and convenient, but every time she thought she had exactly what she wanted, the landlord asked: "No pets?" Lauren replied: "One, but he's very little and no trouble." The landlord repeated: "No pets!"

Droopy, the cocker spaniel who banned the Bacalls from so many homes, was finally admitted to a Beverly Hills apartment court, where he is now a resident with Lauren and her mother. "He's my best friend," confesses his mistress. "I tell him all my troubles, because he never repeats them, is sympathetic and affectionate and always seems to be saying: 'Never mind, what do we care about him—or her—or them? I'm crazy about you, myself!'"

Once settled, Mrs. Bacall promptly went to work. She's been busy all her life and she's not going to sit around idly merely because her only child has a picture contract.

After the excitement of settling in, came—nothing. For eight months, Lauren waited. And waited. People kept asking: "What are you doing?" "When do you work?" Lauren grew very tired of murmuring that she thought something was coming up soon, and trying to look as if it didn't matter that she was getting older and older, and would be nineteen in the Fall.

Age didn't bother Mr. Hawks. When he found the right picture and the right part in "To Have and Have Not," he gave his discovery another screen test, showed it to Jack Warner, who suggested that she play one of the two feminine leads opposite Humphrey Bogart, under Mr. Hawks' direction. When the picture was previewed, Warners' asked for a share in the contract of newly christened Lauren Bacall.

There is a man in Lauren's life, but she refuses to talk about him. She's not married, not even engaged. She doesn't wish to be married for two or three—maybe four or five years or more. But when she does take that step, she'll bow out of studios and off the stage.

"Marriage is the most important thing in life. I'd rather be happily married, running a home, being a wife and mother, than be the most popular star in Hollywood," she asserts. "It's more lasting, more satisfying. I've seen girls who gave up careers for homes, and I've seen girls who tried to keep both—and I know which pays off in the end."

She has never cared about money. She expects to enjoy both fame and fortune, if they come, but they'll just be nice things to have had—some day, when she's happily married.

She loves boats, not yachts but the kind of small sailboat or motorboat you can manage yourself, the sort you can have fun on in old slacks, sweaters and sneakers. She wants to learn all about such a boat, how to keep house on it and cook in the galley. She can't do much in a kitchen now, but she intends to be the world's finest chef once she has said "I do."

She likes to go to a friend's house where everybody knows everybody else; to sit and talk and listen to music.

"I don't like to have my hostess say: 'Now we're going to play games,' but it's nice when someone mentions one and says: 'Let's try that, shall we? It might be fun'."

For example, perhaps a guest remarks that she has read it's absolutely impossible for anyone to walk through a room unselfconsciously. Argument starts, and presently each member of the group is discovering for himself just how unselfconscious he or she can be.

Lauren loves to dance but seldom goes to night clubs. No room to dance there; give her a wide, smooth floor and not too large a crowd.

"If you go to a night club with someone you like very much, you're wasting time," she assured me. "It's bound to be crowded and noisy. You can't talk to each other, so why go? On the other hand, if you're out with someone you don't care for, why go at all?" Lauren would rather read.

She has read more widely than most teen-age girls, is interested in national and international affairs, and likes to listen to people who are well informed.

She sings in her first picture; has a low and exciting voice, and spends time improving it.

"I never thought things would come so fast," admitted the girl who gave herself ten years to succeed. "Perhaps they wouldn't have come so swiftly if I hadn't pushed. I like to think I helped."

Love, though, is something you can't hurry. "You need me," is the wrong approach to Romance, according to Lauren. Hateful as it may be to her, all a girl in love can do is wait. And wait.

While Lauren waits—who knows? She may become, as her discoverers predict, the most interesting face on the screen.

THE END

you can do today." I used to argue with him, saying it would be much better never to do today what you can put off till tomorrow. Maybe you'd be able to skip it altogether.

But after all—

THE TURNING POINT IN MY LIFE

Came from following that old maxim.

I was in New York, trying to get a job on the stage. I was worn out with rushing up and down agency stairs, dashing in and out of theaters where they were supposed to be casting and had just done it, getting rapidly nowhere, disappointed and dead tired. "Gee, I'll go home. I'll pack up and go home——this isn't for me!" It was late and I thought it would be no use bothering any more.

Just then I saw a light in an agent's office. "Well," I said. "I'll try him once more. If there's nothing, that ends it." He had a part for me.

If I hadn't gone up, I'd have missed my chance. If I'd put it off, the part would have been cast.

Or was it in the cards and would it have happened anyway? That's one of the things I'll never really know. But I still say it was luck.

I DON'T BELIEVE

In love at first sight. It takes longer to know a person well enough to imagine love.

I'M A LITTLE VAGUE

About marriage. I'll probably marry when I'm 30 or 32—that's a good age. I'll know more about what I want then. I won't marry an actress. I want my wife to talk about me and my career, not to be worrying all the time about herself and hers. I say, we don't need money that badly. . . . But I could be wrong. I see people every day doing things they always swore they'd never do.

I WANT:

To make a picture in London.

To see this country first of all, after the war, driving across it on four beautiful tires. Then I'd like to go to Bermuda, if it returns to what it once was—no cars, just beauty and wonderful peace. June Havoc used to rave about coming into the harbor at Easter time, and how fragrant were the great fields of lilies, about exploring the floor of the ocean in a diving helmet and going through coral caves. June practically commuted to Bermuda before the war.

To remake "A Man's Castle," the picture Spencer Tracy did with Loretta Young. I'd like to do it with Laraine Day.

I'M MAD ABOUT:

Old pictures—any old pictures;
Night-blooming jasmine;
Eucalyptus, with its Sunday afternoon fireplace smell;
Feather bobs.

I DON'T LIKE:

A woman's hair dressed so elaborately it looks as if she had spent two hours before her mirror getting it right. It's time wasted, far as I'm concerned.

Routines and schedules. People say: "You change so in Hollywood!" I wish I could set aside a couple of nights a week to answer mail, send out pictures, call up friends, do all the nice things I should be doing. But I'm sure I never will.

I PLAY

The violin. I use it for a Sunday tonic. Sunday is the day to go to church, play the violin, take a long walk, drop in to see your friends and call up your father. I love Sundays.

I BELIEVE:

In not sticking your neck out.

In keeping your mouth shut, but I never do. I'm the world's best confidant, however, because I can keep other people's secrets. I never, never tell, so I hear more secrets. But when it comes to keeping my mouth shut, otherwise, I keep on talking. Maybe that sounds crazy to you, but there's a difference.

Nothing's worth worrying about. Things don't mean much to me so I never worry about them. And people have always been so darn swell to me I can't worry about them. So why worry?

WHEN I'M A STAR

people—could see good shows because the prices were beyond pocketbooks. I think the movies have taught us all to appreciate what is good and to know the difference between 'B' and excellent.

"I want the Federal Theatre to be nation-wide, giving the best plays and using fine actors. There's a wealth of talent aching to be used, but they have no chance to be seen because they can't afford to wait for recognition. Competition would be keen and an actor would have to be good to get his chance, but he'd be sure of food and lodging, and ambitious people can live on very little if they know there's a chance. The Federal movement was marvelous while we had it, but I think we need to enlarge it."

It's surprising how many of these youngsters have plans to assist unknown talent. Faye Emerson wants to start a little theatre. She'll even build it, when she has the money and can get priorities, but it will be run on a non-profit basis. All money earned above expenses will be used for worthwhile charities or scholarship funds.

"That's the only way," asserts Faye, "because then the group is interested and ready to work hard for success. There will be no star system; all branches of theatre work will be learned by each member. When I worked in the little theatre in San Diego, I directed, costumed, acted, even wrote, and the training provided was wonderful.

"Most of the little theatres now are commercial, which destroys the value of such groups. Mine would be a real source of talent for stage and screen."

Peter Lawford has toured with amateurs in the Actors' Laboratory and has noticed much talent in the group. "I can't do a thing for them," he tells me, "because so far I'm nobody. When I'm a star, I'll be able to call attention to them and see that they get a chance. Judy Garland today could mention a talented kid to a producer or director who might use him, or talk about him to a big writer in an interview—but until I'm a star, what I say doesn't count."

Tom Drake believes that the great need is for a school of motion picture technique. When an actor comes to Hollywood from the stage, he's terrified of cameras, has no idea how to adapt himself to the new medium. So Tom would like to see that younger players had a place to go to acquire technique.

Angela Lansbury, the English girl who played the maid role in "Gaslight," would like to have an experimental theatre devoted to new developments in writing, acting and producing. They'd try out new ideas, inexpensively, engaging talent that wasn't eager for money but was interested in doing something different.

Stars of today are regarded critically by stars of tomorrow.

"When I'm a star," says Bob Hutton, "I'll always sign autographs. No matter how many fans are waiting in line, I'll always take time to sign for them all. Often I see a crowd of kids so tired they can hardly keep awake, and stars come out of the theatre, rush into their cars and race away, not caring. Maybe they sign one and wave the rest away. I'll never do that!

"My wife and I want a small home with a lot of land. I'd like a workshop like Delmar Daves', with a place to write and a printing press. Natalie writes, so she'd like that. I'd want a workshop and darkroom, so I could develop pictures and make all the odd pieces we want and can't buy."

"I will never hire myself a stooge or have a 'yes man' following me around!" cries Eva Gabor. "To have someone beside me for contrast? Never!

"I'll always dress as I am expected to, as a star, and I will never poke my nose outside the door unless I look well. It is such poor business for an actress to go around looking untidy. We like to blame the California fiesta climate for carelessness, but that is weak and lazy!"

Trudy Marshall's favorite dream is to buy her mother a mink coat; Diana Lynn longs to go to college, then find happiness in marriage; and K. T. Stevens would buy a small island in the South Seas where she'd have a native house, eat native foods and lie in the sun, swim and relax. This would be a place to rest from career, not an end in itself.

"I want to be a glamorous star," confesses Dolores Moran. "I want a lovely big estate with a swimming pool, a mansion full of wonderful things brought me by celebrities who have been everywhere—doorknobs of delicate Dresden china for the bedrooms, exquisite lamps. I want clothes that do things for me, luxurious robes and furs, jewelry specially designed, perfume from the Orient, fabulous glamour.

"I don't want to marry at once, but to have attention from lots of fascinating men. Figures in the world—not just rich men, but famous ones. After the war, I'd like to own my own plane, designed for me—something daring and different, expressing myself."

Then there's Marjorie Riordan, who played in "Mr. Skeffington" with Bette Davis and wants to be like Bette.

"When I came on the set, I was so awed and scared of the big star that I couldn't do anything right," she says. "But Bette smiled and told me how to do my role, taught me more in a few hours than I could have learned anywhere else in days."

Because Gloria de Haven has always lived in apartments, she will buy a house—build one, if war restrictions permit. Gloria doesn't want to be a glamour girl, because those roles mean nothing and she has no use for show. "Once I'm well-known and well-off," plans Gloria, "I'd like to have a play written for my family, and all together we'd do a big show on Broadway."

Many of the younger players think of their families first. Gail Russell would buy a ranch with a nice house on it for hers, and add two horses, one for herself and one for her girl friend, Carmelita Lopez, so they could get away from everyone and relax.

And Jim Brown, who has a wife and two babies, wants a house with a tennis court so he needn't leave home to play his favorite game. He's an ex-champion.

"I'd also like to have a four-piece band. I used to sing with an orchestra and I'd like to have a band around to help me entertain. I'd guarantee them a living and they could take other engagements. I know how hard it is to make your way as a band before you get known, and the boys could help me so I needn't just stand up and say: 'So glad to be here tonight. Period.'"

Leslie Brooks ("Tonight and Every Night") wants her own airplane and her own flower shop. She figures that if she were a star, profits wouldn't matter; she could afford to handle orchids and exotic blooms and not set her prices out of sight. Youngsters who can only window-shop now, could walk right in and buy her flowers for tremendous occasions like a first date, a wedding or a professional appearance.

During the making of "Two Girls and a Sailor," June Allyson suddenly realized what a fascinating business producing can be. That's where she'll head when stardom wanes, when she can't dance any more or her voice is no longer what it used to be. She thinks she'd hate to descend to lesser roles.

Ann Warner's daughter, Joy Ann Paige, has all the money she can use, so a star's salary will mean nothing to her.

"But stardom will give me a voice in the acting world," contends Joy Ann. "When that time comes, I want to do a play. I want the thrill of seeing the stage world from behind the scenes. Not as a visitor or an unimportant actress in a small role, but as someone important to the production, whose views really matter!"

improvement over cutting each other dead. Rags Ragland, the comedian, is credited with having played peacemaker. Rags convinced the boys that as long as they were both working on the Metro lot and were continually bumping into each other, it was silly to keep up the snubbing routine. (Incidentally, the cutting room gossip on The Voice's "Anchors Aweigh," has it that the picture is terrific.)

John Payne is out of the army and back at his home studio, Twentieth Century-Fox. His first picture will be "Waltz Me Around Again, Willie," with Joan Bennett. He is also pencilled in for the male lead in "The Dolly Sisters."

Carmen Cavallaro will handle the musical duties in Twentieth's "Diamond Horseshoe" picture. Carmen will also be seen in Paramount's "Out Of This World." (He and a flock of other name bandleaders, adding up to five!)

Paramount has signed Mary Hatcher, fifteen-year-old coloratura soprano, to a term contract. Though she is a protege of Gladys Swarthout, Cass Daley is indirectly responsible for Paramount's signing her. Cass heard Mary sing at a party and arranged for her to audition for Buddy De Sylva.

Decca:

Charlie Barnet and his orchestra have a pleasing duo in "Come Out, Wherever You Are," and "What A Diff'rence A Day Made." Both vocals are by Kay Starr, a young lady to watch. She's one of the better band singers today.

Ethel Smith, the Hit Parade organist, offers "Tico-Tico" and "Lero Lero." The first side is the samba tune she played in "Bathing Beauty" and the second is a Brazilian march. She is accompanied by the Bando Carioca.

Woody Herman and Company do "Let Me Love You Tonight" and "Who Dat Up Dere?" "Let Me Love You" is the translation of the Spanish tune, "No Te Importe Saber," and is sung by Billie Rogers. Woody does the vocal on "Who Dat?"

Those merry Merry Macs have a cute twosome in "Let's Sing A Song About Susie," and "Up, Up, Up."

El Bingo Crosby has recorded "Too-Ra-Loo-Ra-Loo-Ral" and "I'll Remember April," with John Scott Trotter's orchestra. "Too-Ra-Loo" is the Irish lullaby Bing sang in his great picture, "Going My Way."

That humorous gentleman, James Durante, has waxed two stellar tidbits, "Umbriago" and "Inka Dinka Doo." Roy Bargy's orchestra and the Six Hits And A Miss lend their support.

Jimmie Lunceford jumps in with "Jeep Rhythm," an instrumental, and "I Dream A Lot About You," with a Dan Grissom vocal.

Columbia:

Here's The Nose again—Jimmie Durante on "Hot Patatta" and "Inka Dinka Doo" once more. This version of "Inka" is different from the Decca one and was recorded way back in 1933.

Teddy Wilson and his orchestra are front and center with two sides made a long time ago, "Out of Nowhere" with a vocal by Lena Horne and "You're My Favorite Memory," sung by Helen Ward. Teddy is still playing to capacity business at New York's Cafe Society Uptown.

Frank Sinatra and Harry James are reunited again on "It's Funny To Everyone But Me." The reverse side is "Don't Take Your Love From Me" with the James trumpet featured. Both were recorded several years back.

If you're a record collector, you'll be most interested in the announcement from the Columbia company that they are re-releasing all of their jazz, boogie woogie, and blues albums. Some of the individual discs in these albums have sold for as high as fifty dollars at one time or another. When you read the names of the albums you'll see what I mean: Eddie South, King Louis (Armstrong), "Jazz As It Should Be Played" by Bix Beiderbecke, Fletcher Henderson, Bessie Smith, The Duke (Ellington), "Comes Jazz" (Bud Freeman and the Chigoans), Earl Hines, Frank Teschemacher, Boogie Woogie, Dorsey Brothers, Louis Armstrong and His Hot Five, Teddy Wilson-Billie Holiday, Louis and Earl (Armstrong and Hines). That list represents a lot of good music, and there will be a big demand for these sets, so I suggest that if you want any of them, you tear madly to your nearest music store and put in your bid.

Capitol:

I'm a King Cole Trio fan from way back, and if you like them at all you'll want their first album. The set consists of eight sides, including such tunes as "Embraceable You," "Sweet Lorraine," "The Man I Love," "Body and Soul," and "It's Only A Paper Moon." King's vocal on "Paper Moon" is terrific. Incidentally, the trio has been playing theatres with Benny Carter's band and have broken records every place they've appeared.

Here are two fine instrumentals by Freddie Slack and his orchestra: "Cuban Sugar Mill," a boogie woogie, with Slack featured all the way on piano and celeste, and "Small Batch of Nod." They are two of the best sides Slack has ever made.

Jerry Colonna's first record for Capitol is comical, to say the least: "Can't You Hear Me Callin', Caroline?" and "I Hate Music." Paul Weston's orchestra.

The Paul Weston band also backs Jo Stafford on "I Didn't Know About You" and "Tumbling Tumble Weeds." The vocal group in the background is the Pied Pipers. "I Didn't Know" is the old Duke Ellington melody, "Sentimental Lady."

If you're hungry for hill-billy music, get Tex Ritter's "I'm Wastin' My Tears On You" and "There's A New Moon Over My Shoulder."

JAM NOTES:

Spike Jones had some interesting tales to tell when he returned from his overseas entertainment jaunt. Fred Astaire, Dinah Shore, Bing Crosby and Spike were all in England at the same time.

An unusual thing happened at one of the shows they did together on the docks of a coastal town, with the audience consisting of a mere sixteen thousand soldiers. A Merchant Marine ship was anchored a few hundred yards off shore. The sailors got wind of what was going on, jumped overboard and swam to the show.

Spike says he got a real kick out of playing for Bing because it was the first time they had worked together since Spike was the drummer in John Scott Trotter's band on the Kraft Music Hall program. (Incidentally, Jones says the G.I.'s abroad call Bing "Uncle Sam Without Whiskers.")

The City Slickers was the first band to play the Marseillaise in France after the liberation. During the celebration a tiny little boy went up to the maestro and asked what the name of the song was. He had never heard his own national anthem before.

Coming across to Noo Yawk, on the return trip, Spike wrote a new zany for his band, "A Goose To The Ballet Russe." The tune will be included in the album he is going to record for Victor, called "Musical Depreciation."

When the City Slickers landed in New York they had a swell surprise waiting for them: They will have a big musical spot in Paramount's "Duffy's Tavern." And by the way, don't miss the Corn Crew in "Bring On The Girls." Their "Chloe" number is a killer.

Claude Thornhill got a short furlough from his naval duties as a Chief Petty Officer and hied himself to Hollywood to visit old pals. . . . Donna King, of the King Sisters, has retired temporarily to await a visit from Dr. Stork. Her husband, Lt. Jim Conkling, was recently discharged from the Navy, after being injured in battle. Another Donna, Donna Wood, formerly of the Horace Heidt aggregation, will be a "King Sister" for a while.

Rumor about Hollywood still has it that Artie Shaw will organize a seventeen-piece dance band with no strings. Several top sidemen now playing radio shows in Movietown have been approached by Shaw. . . . Benny Goodman may also reorganize, in spite of his beef with his agents, the Music Corporation of America.

Betty Bradley, Bob Chester's brunette vocalist, is the happy bride of Chester's road manager, Phil Kahl. . . . Ray Eberle finished his theatre tour and came back to Hollywood to learn that he was classified 1-A. . . . His old boss, Glenn Miller, was recently upped from a Captain to a Major in the Air Corps.

Mickey Scrima, ex-James skin beater, has tossed aside his drum sticks and opened an all-night restaurant in Hollywood. It's a favorite spot with musicians. . . . Stan Kenton will open soon at the Hollywood Palladium, his third engagement there. His record of "Her Tears Flowed Like Wine" is one of Capitol's biggest sellers. . . . Les Brown's trumpet star, Randy Brooks, is planning to have a band of his own after the first of the year.

The Brothers Dorsey would like to buy another ballroom in New York. Their Colonnades in Ocean Park, California, has been very successful financially. . . . Freddie Martin will not go into the service, as first reported. He and his band had an eight-week vacation from their "duration" hotel job at the Ambassador in Los Angeles. . . . Harry James says he has no intention of giving up baseball just because he broke his foot. He's only waiting for it to heal so he can play again. Harry won't make his next Metro picture until late this year or early in 1945. Wife Betty still insists she wants to retire from the screen and just be Mrs. Harry James. After seeing her beautiful Beverly Hills home and her adorable baby, Victoria, I can't say that I blame her. The James heiress looks like both Harry and Betty, and is loaded with personality.

Characters, this is it for now, but I'll see you next month from New York. In the meantime, if you have any problems about musical things, drop me a line and I'll take a fast squint into my crystal ball and see if I can toss you an answer. Just be sure to enclose a self-addressed stamped envelope. Write Jill Warren, MOVIELAND Magazine, 1476 Broadway, New York 18, N. Y.

Then, there is Kevin's Apple Loaf Tralee, named for his father, who hails from Tralee, Ireland, also in County Kerry.

Four or five apples	3 eggs
Butter	1 cup sugar
½ pint sour cream	Zwieback
	Cinnamon

Slice four or five apples, put into a saucepan with two tablespoons of butter; stir and melt butter.

In another pan put three beaten eggs and a cup of sugar; mix and heat. Then add ½ pint of sour cream and cook until slightly thick. (If sour cream is not available use sweet cream and add vinegar until just slightly curdled.)

Now crush one package of Zwieback with a rolling pin; mix in two tablespoons of melted butter and some cinnamon with the crumbs. Grease a loaf pan very well and line the sides with this mixture, patting it in well with the fingers. Reserve enough of the mixture for the top.

Now add the apples to the custard and pour into the pan. It is better to spoon the mixture into the pan being careful not to disturb the lining. Pour any remaining custard over the top and cover the whole with the remaining crumbs. Place in an oven at 325 degrees and bake for one hour or more; remove and allow to cool. Turn into a platter and slice.

Of Course You Can't Be There — But —

NO, you can't be there at the dressing station to give him a mother's blessing — a mother's care. All you can do is be thankful that the Army and the Red Cross take such good care of our boys. Yes, and you can see to it that such precious supplies as blood plasma, food and ammunition, and all the thousands of weapons of invasion reach the front in prime condition — ready to do their job.

For every one of the more than 700,000 items shipped to our troops overseas is protected against weather and dirt by paper and paperboard.

That's why your government asks you to save every single scrap of paper in your house and give it to your local paper salvage committee. That's why the government asks you to use less paper — and help the stores where you shop to use less paper. For when you carry your own shopping bag to save the store's paper bags, when you accept your canned and bottled and packaged goods unwrapped, you save that much more paper for the boys at the front and for essential civilian paper use.

Look again at the picture at the top of this page. Etch it on your memory, think of it every time you start to waste paper — any time you start to burn a piece of paper.

FIGHT WASTE!

Remember—

PAPER IS WAR POWER

USE LESS PAPER—SAVE ALL WASTEPAPER

This advertisement prepared by the War Advertising Council in cooperation with the War Production Board, the Office of War Information and published by this magazine, which has joined with the other magazines of the country to save more than 450,000,000 pounds of paper.

FRANCHOT TONE

this town for eleven years, but outside of a small group of close friends he's as little known as when he came. You hear that he's a highbrow, that he's a member of Cafe Society, that he looks down on Hollywood and will leave as soon as he finds a good play; you also hear that he married a Cover Girl from Earl Carroll's and that the Tones can be seen at every bright night spot. . . . All of which puzzles him intensely.

Never very chatty, Franchot finds it hard to talk about himself. "A dull subject," he pronounces it. "Why not just say I'm a strolling player who has never found time to be bored?"

All sorts of things interest him. Trade unionism, for example. He has traced its history from the beginning, believes in it firmly—but when he came to Hollywood in 1933 he found the movie colony completely apathetic. The actors' strike had failed and only a few seemed to care about conditions in the film industry.

"Three months after I arrived, came the bank closing," relates Franchot. "Everyone in the studios, if making over $35 or some such sum, was asked to take a cut of half his salary. Indignation reached a high pitch. This brought about the personal interest which has culminated in pension plans covering the entire studio personnel, from errand girls up. The Screen Guild was an added impetus to this interest." (Franchot was a moving spirit in the Guild's formation and is still an officer.)

No one in the Tone family had ever been connected with the theater until Franchot came along, and it wasn't until he was in college that the stage bug bit him. As a child, his ambitions varied from veterinarian (because he loved dogs) to "being exactly like Dad," who is a scientist and president of the Carborundum Company. Franchot's brother, Frank Jerome Tone, Jr., four years his senior, arranged for him to enroll at Cornell University a year ahead of schedule, and the boy completed the course in three years. It was there he met A. M. Drummond, who was instrumental in arousing his interest in the stage.

"I'd never thought of acting till then," he admits. "I loved plays and pictures, but a career as an actor just hadn't occurred to me."

You don't become an actor just because the idea occurs to you. Franchot had a cousin who owned an interest in a stock company in Buffalo, New York; through this cousin. Franchot was made assistant stage manager, and once inside the stage door he wormed his way from bits to parts.

From stock in Buffalo, he went to the New Playwright's Theater in Greenwich Village, and from there to Broadway in "Age of Innocence" with Katharine Cornell. In 1929 he was engaged by the Theater Guild for a series of plays, including "Hotel Universe" and "Green Grow the Lilacs." His interest in the stage intensified and he became one of the originators of the Group Theater, with whom he appeared in "House of Connolly," "Night Over Taos" and "Success Story."

IRVING KLAW—"The Pin-Up King"
212 East 14th St., New York 3, N. Y. Dept. 202

In 1933 the Group Theater needed money to go on experimenting with good plays. Hollywood had been bidding for Franchot's services for some time (he had already made a film with Claudette Colbert at Paramount's New York Studios) so he decided to dash out to the film city, make a quick fortune and hurry back to the Group with the money.

He came out, made the money, but fell in love, remained to marry Joan Crawford and become a Hollywood star. When he and Joan separated, Franchot returned to New York to do "Gentle People," but the Group Theater wasn't the same. Franchot discovered what everyone has to find out—that you can never go back.

"I went to New York later to do the Hemingway play, which I enjoyed," he comments. "But unless there's something definitely worth doing, I'll not return to the stage. I like pictures. Each one presents a set of problems which must be carefully worked out. How can anyone be bored?"

He continues his deep interest in the theater by collecting a library concerning it; just now he's revelling in a set of illustrated books that are among the earliest published on the subject.

He works—I mean works, not merely lends his name—for the Hollywood Victory Committee, and his war bond tours have taken him all over the country.

Some of his spare time is spent in the completely equipped workshop at his Beverly Hills home, making furniture and gadgets that are not on the market these days. He made two graceful end tables for his library, wedged together without nails or screws in Olde English style. He also invented a gadget to skim the swimming pool of leaves and debris, but it took two strong men to operate the thing and it had to be abandoned.

The house is the Robert Montgomery house, purchased after Franchot's marriage to beauteous Jean Wallace. The workshop was set up by Ray Milland, former tenant, who caught his thumb in a piece of machinery and lost interest in home manufacture.

Mrs. Tone is a tall, tawny-haired young lovely of twenty. She was seventeen on that 13th day of July, 1941, when Franchot met her. The Tones celebrate every July 13th, just as they celebrate their wedding anniversaries. They were married at Yuma, Arizona, three months later, when the bride was eighteen.

Jean had admired Franchot on the screen, but thought she didn't care to meet him. She had heard so much about Hollywood wolves that she had no intention of playing Red Ridinghood to any of them. When other girls who were wild about him said: "Franchot Tone will be here tonight!"—all of a hooha because of it—Jean would reply: "Well, don't bring him anywhere near me!"

But on the fatal 13th, they met at last. They talked. They discovered they had more to say than could be said in one evening, so they made another date—and another.

Ten days after their meeting, Franchot was suddenly stricken and rushed to a hospital, terribly ill.

"I thought I'd never see him again," confessed Jean. "I knew I was desperately in love, but I couldn't believe

I meant anything to him. I'd heard about his going around with girls and I was afraid I was just another girl. It seemer unfair that I should lose him before I really knew him. I nearly lost my mind worrying. I'd go out with other men, trying to pretend I didn't care. When he heard that, he was nearly crazy, because he'd fallen in love, too!

"I tried to see him at the hospital, but the nurses wouldn't let me in. They said he was too ill for callers. I tried to reach him on the telephone, but they wouldn't put me through. I still have the frantic, feeble notes he wrote me, begging me to come, asking why he didn't hear. It seemed so long before I got word, and the writing showed me how terribly, terribly ill he was. One minute I'd be deliriously happy because he cared; the next, I'd be panicky because I was afraid he'd die before I saw him again, or I'd find out it was all a fever and he didn't really love me after all.

(Franchot, on the other hand, says he fell in love with Jean at first sight, but it took him six months to persuade her to take a chance on him. He's counting from an April day in 1941 when he merely looked at her across a room and loved her.)

Jean's family nickname is The Worrier. She can't remember when she didn't worry—first about school, then about her mother, then about her younger brother and sister. Her mother was young, lovely and not very happy; Jean constituted herself as protector. Brother Jack, two years younger than Jean, was sensitive and shy but musically gifted, and little sister Carol, fourteen years Jean's junior, added to the girl's responsibility.

"I finished high school in three years instead of four," tells young Mrs. Tone, "but my grades weren't as high as they should have been because I was always worrying. I was afraid SOMETHING would happen . . . or wouldn't. It's been so good for me to be married to Franchot, because he never worries. Little by little he's teaching me to stop, or at any rate not to run to meet disaster.

"Franchot is such a sweet, thoughtful, understanding, unexpected sort of person. He's hard to know unless you fall in love with him, but he's so worth knowing! I've always liked older men. I haven't a friend of my own age, because when I'm with kids I feel as if I were their mother. Right now at Twentieth Century-Fox, where I'm under contract, a group of the younger girls are doing the play 'Stage Door.' Most of them are around my age—maybe I'm actually the youngest—but they seem so juvenile to me!"

Jean has a moving and sultry loveliness, great poise, and such beauty that it's no wonder Earl Carroll noticed her on a dance floor at the Stevens Hotel in her hometown Chicago, one night. Jean had graduated from high school. Mr. Carroll was giving a show with his famous girls. He gave Jean a salestalk about joining his show and was so persuasive that she, in turn, argued her father into permitting it.

"All my life I'd dreamed of the screen," said Jean. "I thought this was the key to Hollywood. The whole family came with me, but after two months in the show my father took me out of it."

Next came a contract with Paramount Studios, where Jean played a

Which Deodorant wins your vote?

☐ CREAM? ☐ POWDER? ☐ LIQUID?

For ordinary uses, you may prefer one type of deodorant, your neighbor another. But for one purpose—important to you and to every woman—there's no room for argument.

Use Powder for Sanitary Napkins

For while creams and liquids are suitable for general use, a powder is best for sanitary napkins. That's because a powder has no moisture-resistant base; doesn't retard napkin absorption.

There is ONE Powder

few roles—and July 13th.

"When Franchot asked me to marry him, he wanted to know if I would like to go on with my career. I said: 'I don't know. I've thought of nothing else all my life; I've wanted it so very much, it may be hard to give it up.' He didn't press me. At first, he was always going somewhere; I'd pack up and go with him. Then I had the baby and was ill all the time. A career seemed far away and unimportant. But now I'm well and strong, Paddy is ten months old, and I'm ready to work.

"You can't be married to an actor and stay out of show business, if you love him. You know how it is in Hollywood: if you're not part of pictures you might as well not be present at any gathering. It's a tight little circle that shuts you out. You're invisible. I want to be part of Franchot's life—and he understands."

Stories that Franchot spent his honeymoon with all his in-laws are not true. The Tones went to the Racquet Club in Palm Springs for the honeymoon, then took Hedy Lamarr's Beverly Hills house and made their numerous trips from it. When they bought their present home, Jean's mother consented to live in and care for it while they were traveling and acquiring special Early American pieces for it, and later while they were welcoming Pascal Franchot Tone, the son and heir. Jean's brother Jack and baby sister were with their mother. After the mother's marriage early in 1944, and Jack's enlistment with the Marines, little Carol continued to live with Jean.

"People sometimes think she's mine," observed Jean, as we watched the little girl dancing in and out of the library on various imaginary errands. "I don't mind—she's so sweet—but after all I was fourteen when she was born! I've always wanted to give Jack and Carol the carefree life I didn't have. I'm devoted to them. I never thought I'd have a child of my own."

Speaking of Paddy, the wonder boy, Franchot is a devoted father. When Jean was in the hospital, Franchot moved a bed into his studio dressing room at Universal, where he was working at the time, so that he could save gas for hospital trips every night. He had a day off when mother and child came home, and spent most of it touring the city's hardware stores looking for baby scales, until someone took pity on him and explained that you get baby things at baby shops.

The Tones take pleasure in finding exactly the right pieces for their home. It's taking a long time, as they won't buy a thing unless it "belongs." Franchot found the rare editions for his library, and it was Jean who chose the leopard skin couch before the fireplace and the leopard skin drapes at the windows.

To Jean, too, belongs the credit for the newly decorated living room, which is most effective. The walls are light blue, the rug soft, thick and white, drapes and upholstery combine subdued red, white and blue, and a crimson Chesterfield strikes a dramatic note.

The man who is never bored has only recently discovered the joy of doing things with his hands. He's also learned how much fun children can be. He intends to enjoy his son thoroughly, but not to plan the boy's life. Paddy is to work things out for himself.

capture Guam and take Saipan and the Tinian Islands.

Six of the Marine Corps cameramen who photographed these scenes lost their lives in the process—that's your evidence for front-line and underfire authenticity!

Taken originally for use of the Military Intelligence in training staff officers, the film affords civilian audiences their first opportunity to see heretofore secret American weapons, actual scenes of Jap suicides, Jap snipers trying to escape, and the surrender of Jap civilians.

Twenty-one minutes of a powerful and gripping account of our Pacific War.

BABES ON SWING STREET (Universal)
Give me some skin, Jackson! Here comes that hep-chick Peggy Ryan, in her newest dish o' jive.

Peggy and her solid pals (sans, however, the also very talented but now in uniform Mr. Donald O'Connor) are in something of a stew in this one, kids. Her neighborhood guys and gals, interested mainly in jam sessions, but also possessing considerable long-haired tendencies, are offered scholarships for furthering their classical careers—if they can raise a hundred dollars to start the project.

So what to do? Have a kid's night club, of course!

Countless amusing (and some not so amusing) problems arise before the revue gets revued (sharp!). But with the help of Leon Errol, Anne Gwynne, Kirby Grant, Ann Blyth, June Preisser and others, the stuff gets jumping and flattens 'em in the aisles.

Give the little lady a great big hand, boys!

GIT ALONG LITTLE DOGGIES (Republic)
Gene Autry fans (and we know there are lots of them!) will be delighted about this re-leasing of the picture with such oily complications.

The sides taken in this story, about putting down an oil well near the western community where cattlemen oppose the whole project on the grounds that oil and cattle won't mix, are about as changeable as political party affiliations on the day after election. Gene starts out by being "against" and winds up getting in a lot of trouble because he's changed his mind and is "for."

Judith Allen has a lot to do with all this, and Frog (your old pal, Smiley Brunette), quite by accident, is responsible for making everything come out with a happy ending.

On the musical side, add the Maple City Four, with all their assorted wash-tubs, scrubbing boards and tin horns. And the songs you'll hear again are things like "If You Want to Be a Cowboy", "Wait for the Wagon," and "Chinatown."

PICTURES IN PRODUCTION

WOMEN'S ARMY has inducted Lana Turner, Laraine Day (don't miss her latest picture, "Bride By Mistake," if you have to mortgage the family bee to go), Susan Peters, Agnes Moorehead (who is superb as the friend in "Mrs. Parkington"), and June Lockhard.

THE VALLEY OF DECISION is the picturization of Marcia Davenport's exciting book, with Greer Garson, Gregory Peck, Lionel Barrymore, Donald Crisp, Marsha Hunt, Gladys Cooper (her genteely looped scenes in "Mrs. Parkington" are superb), and Sara Allgood.

AT PARAMOUNT:

SALTY O'ROURKE has Alan Ladd and Gail Russell, opposed by Bruce Cabot in his first post-war picture.

LOST WEEKEND, the frightening book by Charles Jackson, is to employ Ray Milland in the role of the drunkard, which is pretty funny because there are few men in Hollywood more sober than Mr. Milland. Jane Wyman is to be the loyal, intelligent sweetheart, and the manner in which she got the part is typically cinematic. Brackett & Wilder, who are producing the picture, were headed for a projection room to see rushes of a new picture and stumbled by accident into a room where "Princess O'Rourke" was being shown. If you remember this one, Jane was married to Jack Carson, and the scene being unreeled as the two producers barged in showed Jane dancing with Jack and looking up at him, wordlessly, but with such worship in her eloquent face and eyes that no one could mistake her feelings. "That's for us," said Messrs. B & W, and Janie was in.

MISS SUSIE SLAGLE'S is going great, with Sonny Tufts, Veronica Lake, Lillian Gish (coming into the Commissary looking like a beautiful fugitive from a family album), and Joan Caulfield.

AT RKO:

EXPERIMENT PERILOUS is a murder mystery that started out to be modern of background but retrograded in history because Hedy Lamarr had never done a costume picture and thought it would be fun. The frightening husband is Paul Lukas, and the doctor who arrives in the gasp of Fate is George Brent. This one sounds like a goodie.

IT'S A PLEASURE has Sonja Henie on thin ice again, with the assistance of Michael O'Shea, Bill Johnson, and Marie McDonald.

THE WONDER MAN is the Danny Kaye picture that had to be postponed because of Danny's gruesome gam, but all is again leg of spring lamb.

CHINA SKY is the story of a doctor, Randolph Scott, who returns to his post in China with a spoiled, uncompromising young wife, Ellen Drew. At the same post there is a tender, sympathetic woman doctor, Ruth Warrick. 'Nuff said.

actor to play a Hitler role in a picture called 'The Devil With Hitler.' saw the shot, tested me, and signed me for the part. I've been playing Hitler ever since—but I think I'm through with it now. 'The Hitler Gang' just about covers everything that could possibly be told about the Nazis, so there won't be any need for additional Hitler roles. Anyway, I don't want people to think that's all I can do."

Actually, he has played Hitler just five times. The four following the original Roach film were "Nazi Nuisance," a flash in "The Miracle of Morgan's Creek," "Hitler, Dead or Alive," and "The Hitler Gang."

It was his physical resemblance to Der Fuehrer, plus acting ability, that won for Watson his Hitler roles. He was born with the first, and developed the second through years of hard work in the theatre.

Watson probably is the only actor whose first job was stripping tobacco in a cigar factory. That was in Springfield where his grandfather had been a friend and confidant of a young lawyer named Abe Lincoln. The tobacco job lasted only until Watson could find something else to do. It didn't take long. His best friend was Eddie Dwyer, and Eddie's mother ran a boarding house that was a hangout for whatever vaudeville and theatrical talent passed through Springfield. The performers taught the two youngsters some of their pet routines, and the lads soon won an amateur night contest. They were promptly hired by the Empire Theatre in the rather unique capacity of working on the stage in burlesque and selling peanuts in the audience.

Watson also toured with a medicine show, hit the nickle theatres in Chicago's loop with Dwyer, soloed in vaudeville and eventually hit the top circuits like Keith, Orpheum, Pantages and Sullivan and Considine. He and Dwyer used one Scotch dialect act for three years without changing a line.

The actor later teamed with such artists as Liane Carerra, the daughter of Anna Held; Charlie Howard, and the Duncan Sisters. George M. Cohan finally spotted Watson in the No. 2 company of "Going Up" in the part created by Frank Craven. Probably his best known role was that of Mme. Lucy, the male modiste in "Irene," in which he played for two years.

Watson made his screen debut in "Syncopation," the second talking picture to be filmed in New York. From that time on, until 1933, he divided his time between pictures in New York and Hollywood, and stage appearances in both cities.

The Hitler role in "The Hitler Gang," he thinks, was just about the toughest of his career. He studied some 30,000 feet of newsreel film to learn Hitler's mannerism, gestures, arrogant stance. His previous portrayals had been largely in a comedy vein. This was to be serious, serious enough to bring before the public for the first time a pictorial, honest presentation of the Nazi rise to power. Watson wanted his characterization to be absoluely perfect.

He listened to recordings of Hitler's radio speeches so that he could dupli-

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

cate them—in English—with the same inflections, the same emphasis on certain words, the same mouthings.

"That really caused me a bit of trouble," he explained. "I had always worn a false mustache when I played Hitler before and just combed my hair down over one eye. This time I had my hair trimmed in Hitler fashion, and grew a real mustache. My neighbors looked at me a bit askance. And one night when they heard me yelling and screaming a particularly brutal anti-Semitic speech, they descended on me in a body, ready to have me committed to an asylum. The explanation that I was rehearsing didn't get over any too well.

"After that I did my rehearsing at night on vacant sound stages at the studio—whenever I had any speeches to do. I didn't leave my trailer unless I had to. I ate in the commissary kitchen at the studio, instead of the dining room. Too many people were staring and remarking.

"I tell you," says Watson, "I got to be a pretty lonely citizen while we were in production."

Watson lives in his trailer by preference, and has lived there eight years. He had owned some property in the East, which he lost, and vowed he'd never again own anything he can't take with him. He can take the trailer—or could, until gas rationing. His favorite drive was to Taos, New Mexico, where he has many friends among the artists and Indians there. They have an Indian name for him which he thinks means "Chief Carry Little Pueblo Behind."

Watson's trailer, since it is now more or less immobilized, might well be a house. It is modern and completely equipped. He has planted pepper trees, flowers and a Victory garden. He gives parties at a barbecue, which he also erected himself. His friends and neighbors are Walter Catlett and Chester Clute.

"You know," says Watson, "I guess every fool who thinks he looks like Hitler has, at one time or another, done just what I did. I certainly didn't expect my one-minute party routine to develop into a career. If I had the gas I'd get out of here right now and disappear for a couple of months. Maybe by the time I got back people would forget I look like Adolf and would have some comedy roles for me. I could use a few right now.

"I've got one idea, though. Everybody is thinking up ways and means to punish Hitler and his gang after the war. I'd like to show 'em all 'The Hitler Gang' about a dozen times a day. Then they could see themselves as others see them—and that ought to be punishment enough."

EDITOR'S NOTE

The abdication of Der Fuehrer—whether voluntary or forced—will put Watson out of a job, but he'll be duly grateful. It has been a job he didn't want; one which was thrust upon him, for reasons this story has explained.

As we go to press, it is yet to happen. But Hitler's permanent retirement as the loopy leader of the German Reich seems an assured certainty, and when that time comes there'll be no one more pleased and rejoicing than Robert Watson of Hollywood!

JOYCE REYNOLDS

stretch at the cinema with you.

She likes being with people, can't remember ever having been shy. The only thing that saves her from being a gad-about is the fact that she requires ten hours sleep a night.

In between sleeping nearly half her time away, and working at the studio, she likes to have friends over to her Westwood home. She lives with her mother and grandmother, who came out from Texas with her when she decided to enroll at U.C.L.A. They bought the house then, and though Joyce has to travel nearly thirty miles to work, they're not tempted to move.

Joyce has a secret ambition and a secret vice. The secret vice is for chocolate cake, which she'll eat at any hour of the day—preferably in a movie.

Her secret ambition, if the studio knew it, might be of some concern. Because Joyce would like to spend her time living on a ranch—and you know what happens when Miss Reynolds makes up her mind to anything.

She wants a place with a stream so she can fish, and a place nearby to hunt. She used to do both with her father before he passed away three years ago, and never lost her taste for the outdoor life.

As we intimated, Joyce owns a chunk of Texas in her own right. Her father left her a hundred acres near Houston; she takes possession on her twenty-fourth birthday. Joyce thinks that's wonderful, but wishes out loud it were ranch land instead. She needs a place, she tells you seriously, to keep her horses. It sounds like an awful problem, until you suddenly remember that she doesn't have the horses yet.

There'll not be any for awhile, either—especially after her recent experience with a purely mythical pig, which almost cost Joyce her grandmother.

It started on the "Janie" set, when a make-up man was telling Joyce about the cute baby pigs on his ranch and offered her one. She explained that her home in Westwood was hardly the place for such things, and declined. But she added: "Oh, how I'd love to have one." And her mother walked by just in time to hear the end of the conversation.

Knowing her daughter's impulsiveness, Mrs. Reynolds immediately assumed the worst and started to protest. Joyce gave the make-up man a wink, and the gag was on. He strolled away while she was explaining to her mother that she couldn't get out of accepting the pig now, without offending the man.

For two days, Chez Reynolds was in an uproar. Grandma stated flatly that she wasn't going to play nursemaid to any pig, no matter how cute.

That was the last straw—and Grandma announced she was going back to Texas. She had her bags all packed, before Joyce finally broke down and confessed.

Which is just one of the reasons her mother and grandmother agree so wholeheartedly with the studio's claims that, in Joyce Reynolds, they have discovered an exciting new personality.

What is Wrong When Prayer Fails?

The prayers of the most worthy people often fail. Why? The unworthy often have the greatest health, success, riches and happiness. The best, smartest, and most industrious people often have only pain, poverty and sorrow. Why? EDDIE BRACKEN the Kiddies evaded the Gerry Act prohibiting young children from stage work. At all events, there was Eddie, aged five, convoying his small self through New York's subways to and from outlying theatres. A five-year-old didn't have to pay fare if accompanied by an adult; Eddie was adept at joining all sorts of unaware elders.

Eddie never graduated from grammar school. Because he was usually working in some branch of smalltime show business, he was enrolled in the Professional Children's School for Actors. Lessons were given by correspondence method, whether or not the young actor was in the classroom. Poring over multigraphed pages only bored him, and he dodged as much education as possible.

The lack of formal schooling doesn't exactly depress him now, for he's been making up for it by reading everything he can get his hands on, studying whatever new subject catches his interest, informing himself with reference books and authorities in a way that could not have been possible earlier.

His main advantage over the college graduate, as he sees it, is that he knows he doesn't know and will never stop trying to learn.

It was when he was thirteen that he first met Junior Durkin, understudying that brilliant juvenile in "The Lottery." Junior's later Hollywood success gave Eddie movie fever.

The Brackens were no better off than usual and funds for a trip to the coast didn't exist. Eddie had only the $4.20 which his mother had given him to pay for putting his picture in a Long Island newspaper, the day he was sixteen.

He was feeling very old that birthday. Years were passing and he was getting nowhere. For the only time in his life he succumbed to temptation, appropriated the $4.20 and started to hitch-hike to Hollywood.

It took him eleven days. He wasn't used to soft living, but hitch-hiking was a grueling ordeal. Broke, hungry, homesick and miserable, he refused to give up. He stumbled on, thumbing frantically. Once he went to the jail in a small town and asked to be allowed to sleep there. They let him occupy a cot, but woke him at six to send him on his way.

Eddie looked like a scarecrow by the time he reached Shamrock, Oklahoma. That's a town he'll never forget, for it was there that he knocked at the back door of a modest bungalow, timidly asked for something to eat, and was invited in to a delicious dinner.

"Those were the kindest people I ever met," he declares. "I don't know how it happened that I didn't get their names. I've tried, but I haven't been able to find them since I've been in the money."

Does any Shamrock family recognize itself?

At the end of eleven days, Eddie dragged himself into Hollywood and slept under the trees at the corner of Vermont and Hollywood Boulevards.

"One of these days," he thought, as he lay shivering in the October chill, "I'll be driving past here in my Rolls Royce, with my monogram on the door and a couple wolf hounds on the back seat, coming from my great big house with its tiled swimming pool. People will look after me and say: 'Gee, there goes Eddie Bracken, the big movie star!' "

None of that seemed likely when he woke up. He was colder than ever and practically hollow with hunger. All he could think of was finding Junior Durkin. Junior was working steadily. Junior would tell him what to do.

But the Durkin telephone number was secret and it was days before Eddie finally persuaded the doorman at Paramount Studios to call the young actor and ask if he cared to speak with a guy named Bracken.

"Why sure, come out and stay at our house!" invited Junior, cordially.

Grace and Gertrude, the Durkin sisters, added their welcome to their brother's and Eddie stayed with them for ten weeks while he tried desperately, but ineffectually, to get a screen job.

"Something will break for you," became the Durkin rallying cry throughout those discouraging weeks.

But nothing did break, and finally along came a telegram from Mrs. Bracken, telling of a stage offer in New York and sending money for a return trip by bus.

"It had been gosh-awful hard for my family to get that much money together," remembers the young comedian. "There was only enough for the fare and a dollar a day to eat on. Not enough to get my suit back from the cleaner's. I borrowed two dollars from Grace to retrieve the suit . . . and paid it back exactly ten years later.

The New York offer turned out to be a flop, but Eddie lined up another engagement, kept himself fairly busy for a few seasons and finally hit the jackpot in "Brother Rat," beginning by playing the youngest role in the play and winding up as lead in the New York company and on tour.

George Abbott, Broadway producer, thought highly of Eddie and didn't conceal it. He had two companies of "Brother Rat" on tour when he acquired "What A Life!" the story of Henry Aldrich. Eddie, announced Abbott, was a natural for the role of Henry. The two Rat companies should be combined and Eddie brought back to Broadway.

"By that time," confesses Eddie, "I thought I was slightly terrific, myself. It goes to show you should keep your headsize normal.

"Before I could get back to New York, Mr. Abbott had a reading of the play and let Ezra Stone stand in for me. Ezra was a knock-out. When I arrived and read the part, thinking I was tops, I didn't even make a dent. The part went to Ezra. Mr. Abbott told me I could have a small role, if I wanted it, or I could go back to 'Brother Rat.'

"It was a come-down, but I took the small role. I thought I had let Mr. Abbott down by being a smarty and I wanted to prove to him that I could act. I kept after him and at last he let me do Henry in a road company."

It was while this road company was being assembled that Eddie dropped in to see the New York company doing "Brother Rat." There was an entire new cast. The girl who played Claire was beautiful. And when you say "beautiful," you haven't told the half of it.

Eddie had an all-gone feeling whenever he looked at her, which was whenever she was visible. He went backstage after the show to get a closer view and tell her how clever she was in the role—was even a bit breathless as he repeated his praises.

But she seemed unimpressed. "Nice of you," she murmured, looking at somebody else. Then she began to talk to a third party.

"She's up-stage," Eddie told himself. Who was she, anyway? What difference did it make if she was big-time or not? He'd never see her again!

But he was wrong, on all counts. Presently he discovered that the girl was his leading lady in "What A Life!" Then after a year she became his leading lady in real life. Her name was Connie Nickerson, but she likes Connie Bracken better. They have a baby girl, Judy, nearly two years old.

Eddie's biggest Broadway hit, "Too Many Girls," brought him bids from six Hollywood Studios. The best of these came from Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, but Mickey Rooney was a star at that studio, and Eddie thought Mickey would get their plum roles, so he went to Paramount.

One hit role followed another—in "Life With Henry," "The Fleet's In," "Too Many Girls," "Happy Go Lucky"—to mention only a few. And on to his more recent triumph in "Miracle of Morgan's Creek."

He's "in the money" now, but money isn't going to Eddie's head. Good reason why—the Brackens have already "gone Hollywood" and come back.

When he first could afford it, Eddie and Connie moved into a big house with the biggest swimming pool in Beverly Hills. It was the realization of that dream he'd had under the trees on the hill at Vermont and Hollywood Boulevards. Now he was a big shot, now he lived in a great big house, drove a swanky car, wore expensive Hollywood sports clothes and gave swell parties.

"But we weren't happy," confides Eddie with a shake of the head. "That house was so big my wife and I couldn't even find each other, half the time. Crowds of people were always dropping in—people we hardly knew. People we hadn't met turned up at our parties.

"Suddenly we woke up to the fact that we were miserable."

When Eddie finds himself in a spot, he does something about it. This time he moved out of the big house and into a modest bungalow on the wrong side of Beverly's tracks. It hasn't a pool nor a patio, but it has a big backyard. Kids on the street play football and Eddie plays with them. Neighbors borrow cups of milk back and forth. Connie discusses babies over the back fence. It's a home and the Brackens say they're nuts about it.

Eddie hopes to be a director some day.

"An actor," says he, "can keep going only so long, but a director can work as long as he can stand up. I love work. When I've learned enough about directing, I'll put on a campaign and beat the drums till they let me try it!"

This is the saga, then, of a boy with no advantages.

IRENE

unidentified extra. (Not that she actually does all this work herself—that would be too much—but she supervises and directs.)

How many other designers can boast such complete power? Irene, however, is not one to boast. She freely admits being from Baker, Montana, where a girl had to make her own clothes or be content with something everyone had seen, either in the general store or in the mail-order catalogue.

"I remember Mother's coming home one day with a length of gingham and a pattern for an apron," she says, "and saying it was time I learned to sew. I don't remember just how old I was then, but by the time I was in high school I was making all my own clothes.

It was Irene's original ambition, though, to be a concert pianist. And strangely enough, it was that ambition which took her to Los Angeles, to enroll in the University of Southern California for music training—and quite by coincidence, to start her clothes designing career. Night classes first, at the Wolfe Costume Designing School (because a design-interested friend wanted company for attending the course). Then, the night classes completed, a trial business venture.

Irene decided to open a shop. And being just across from the campus, the shop gained quick popularity—"not because of my first clothes," Irene is quick to say in her usual unassuming way, "but as a meeting place. The girls all came there because it was a place where they could smoke. A co-ed being fitted had twenty to thirty others sitting around on the floor, praising or criticizing—and smoking."

Success stories in Hollywood usually involve some benevolent prince or a kindly fairy godmother. And no need to claim an exception in this case, because into this little campus dress shop one day walked Dolores del Rio.

"When she left," Irene recalls, "I could hardly believe what had happened. My prices had been $35 and $45 for day dresses, $75 and $85 for evening gowns. Dolores took two or three of the samples and from my hastily made sketches ordered an evening gown. Bravely I quoted a price of $150.

"I was sure it was too much, and that she'd never come back and pay for it. Since then, though, I've learned—I've charged $1,750 for a gown without a single qualm.

"Dolores not only paid my price; she voluntarily gave me more than I'd asked. Not only that, she wore the gown to one of Hollywood's most dazzling parties. It was a hit, and she generously told who had made it.

"Customers began to flock to my shop, after that. Soon I had to move to larger quarters, and decided upon Hollywood."

The importance of her clientele rapidly increased. But feeling, then, that she must learn at first hand something of the French tradition which had made Paris the fashion capital of the world, away she went—to Europe.

After studying and touring for a year and a half, she returned to Hollywood, accepted an offer to establish her own salon in one of the smart Wilshire Boulevard stores, and the name Irene quickly took on a lot of prestige. Her invitational showings were distinguished, brilliantly successful, and attracted the best-dressed women of the world.

Many movie stars came to Irene for personal wardrobes, but she had and wanted no part in the business of designing clothes strictly for the screen. The time came, though, and Irene didn't have to go to the studios, for Customer Constance Bennett brought a studio to her. And seeing the Irene-designed costumes Miss Bennett wore for "Topper" at the Hal Roach Studios other stars—Ginger Rogers, Claudette Colbert and Rosalind Russell—began to demand Irene creations for their screen wardrobes.

Five years later, she had signed the contract with MGM and was not merely a designer but a supervisor of designers, head of her own staff. Each of Irene's assistants has special talents and is assigned to certain pictures. Irene directs and supervises their work, adding here, making suggestions there.

Among the trends which she had set, during the years preceding her present studio activity, was the illusion of tantalizing revelation with nude souffle. Into shops all over the country went copies of this suave sexiness, particularly the provocative but proper little black dresses with flesh chiffon. Then the really feminine suit, with all the functional values which had made the football-shouldered, masculine suit so popular. The cap sleeve which Irene introduced three years ago is predominant again this season.

Today, women who made a career of clothes now make a career of war activities, and motion pictures depicting modern times have come as down to earth as they were once exaggerated.

In "Marriage Is a Private Affair," Lana Turner is a young lieutenant's wife. (Sketches accompanying this story are the clothes Irene designed for her.) June Allyson and Marsha Hunt in "Music for Millions" are young music students. Myrna Loy is a young wife going to visit her husband's family in a small town, in "The Thin Man Goes Home." In "Bathing Beauty," Esther Williams is a physical education teacher. Judy Garland's a soldier's sweetheart, in "The Clock"; Phyllis Baxter, a lieutenant's wife, in "Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo."

So there are wartime restrictions, you see, even in fashion designing. Except for costume pictures such as "Kismet," Irene hasn't created any of her fabulous gowns for the MGM stars. She is looking forward, however, to creating costumes for Lucille Ball and Lucille Bremer in "Yolanda" (from Ludwig Bemelmans' book), which will give her an opportunity to express herself along those lines again.

Asked what's the greatest difference between the average American girl and the so-called smart woman, Irene tells you the girl follows blindly the formula of the season, without thought of her own personality or figure. The smart woman adopts a style or mode essentially her own.

This may mean she wears suits from dawn to dawn—street suits, cocktail suits, evening gowns with a tailored look; it may mean that all her clothes feature dolman sleeves or short sleeves or long sleeves; that she wears only black or only white; that she wears a basic dress depending upon a variety of accessories to give chic. In other words, the smart woman is distinctive.

Irene approves the French woman's custom of shopping for clothes only twice a year, thereby coordinating her wardrobe wisely and perfectly. Hats, she believes, are the only justifiable "spur of the moment" purchases.

She makes no predictions about "after the war" fashions. "They can go most any way," she says. "Today we see fewer slacks and more dresses, because women wear slacks to work. When the men come back we may find still greater changes. Only two things seem fairly certain—the basic silhouette will not change much, nor will tight corsets return. Women are too accustomed to free body movement to tolerate restricting corsets again, I believe."

Irene receives a lot of fan-mail, most of which she classifies into three general categories: those wanting support in their fashion opinions, those wanting advice on how to make a complete change, and those wanting to know how to pattern a career after hers.

To those who write asking how to effect a complete change, she advises first of all a change of make-up, coiffure and outlook, along with improved health and better figure. Then careful self-analysis of type and equally careful purchasing of wardrobe.

To those who want to know what course to follow for becoming a successful designer, she advises a good college education with stress on foreign languages and research on costumes and customs, in addition to study of design in a reputable school.

Irene herself says she's been very lucky. But luck without sure instinct and thorough grounding would not have taken her from the ranks of the would-be designers to the heights she's reached today, sitting right up there on top of her profession—and we do mean "the top."

HOROSCOPE

hard work and careful interpretation of her roles.

Saturn, the planet which offers limitations and delays, has given her many problems which, with ineffable charm, she keeps strictly to herself, along with her own fears and shyness. Her Moon in its relationship to Neptune, Uranus and Saturn—the last three Planets of slow motion, holding this relationship throughout her life —has helped her make many sacrifices, for she has great intuition and inner assurance that her inspirations and dreams are fine and worthwhile, and with hard work and patience will be realized. This patience has been doubly difficult, since her nature is impulsive and she does not enjoy delays; too, she has had more than her share of unkindness, for she is extremely sensitive. Being a keen critic, she is often as dissatisfied with her own efforts as well as those of others; but a warmly affectionate and loyal heart has made her severely honest with herself.

There are alternate "spells" of activity and inactivity; any out of door interests are beneficial, and a fondness for animals may make horseback riding a great pleasure.

She has the rare combination of idealism and practicality, although it is sometimes almost impossible to keep the two emotional sides from conflicting—the profound, intellectual and occasionally foreboding side, and the emotional, ardent, enthusiastic side. While her inspirations rest on an unworldly but firm foundation, there is little selfishness in her, and she is often far too generous with herself—her resources and her all too-limited time.

The close of 1944 finds Miss Gifford well-established in her profession, and 1945 promises to be fortunate, for it brings her several roles of dramatic calibre which would try the experience of one who had less courage and self-confidence.

Keep on expecting great things of the lovely Frances; her popularity is on a big up-curve, and she's soon to be firmly established as the brightest Nova in the Cinema Firmament.

These people buy a battleship —every week!

Meet John S——— and Mary D———

John works at an electronics plant on Long Island, and makes $85 a week. Almost 16% of it goes into War Bonds.

Mary has been driving rivets into the hide of one bomber after another out at an airplane plant on the West Coast. She makes $55 a week, and puts 14% of it into War Bonds.

John and Mary are typical of more than 27 million Americans on the Payroll Savings Plan who, every single month, put a half a BILLION dollars into War Bonds. That's enough to buy one of those hundred-million-dollar battleships every week, with enough money for an aircraft carrier and three or four cruisers left over.

In addition, John and Mary and the other people on the Payroll Plan have been among the biggest buyers of extra Bonds in every War Loan Drive.

When you come to figure out the total job that John and Mary have done, it's a little staggering.

They've made the Payroll Savings Plan the backbone of the whole War Bond-selling program.

They've helped keep prices down and lick inflation.

They've financed a good share of our war effort all by themselves, and they've tucked away billions of dollars in savings that are going to come in mighty handy for both them and their country later on.

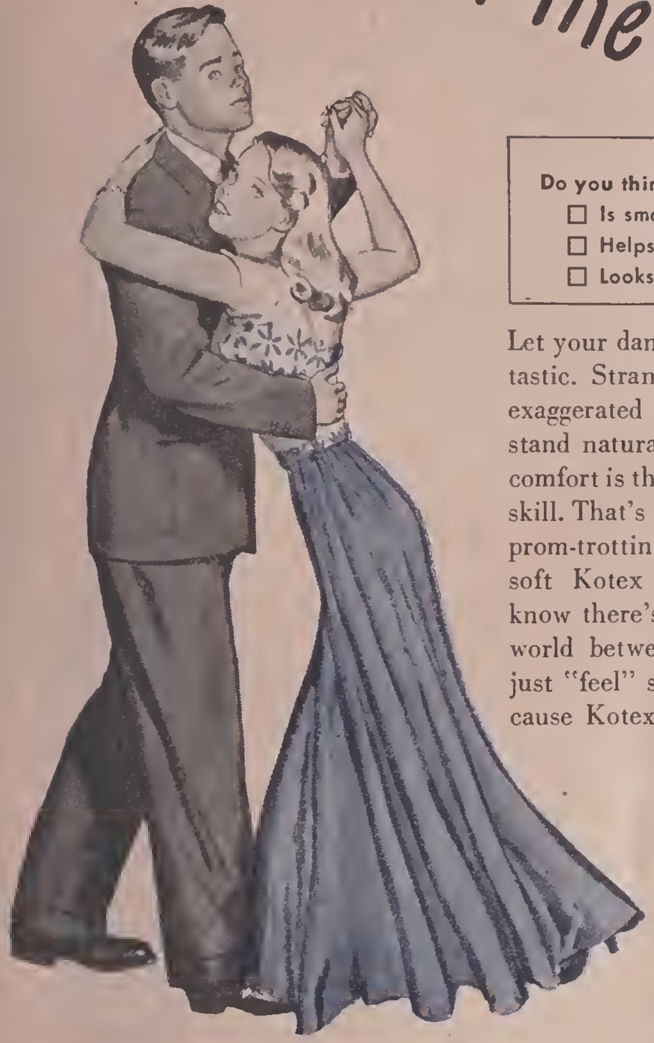
When this war is finally won, and we start giving credit where credit is due, don't forget John and Mary. After the fighting men, they deserve a place right at the top of the list. They've earned it.

6th WAR LOAN

You've backed the attack—now speed the Victory!

This is an official U.S. Treasury advertisement—prepared under auspices of Treasury Department and War Advertising Council

Are you in the know?



Do you think her dancing position—
- ☐ Is smooth and relaxed
- ☐ Helps a tall girl look shorter
- ☐ Looks affected

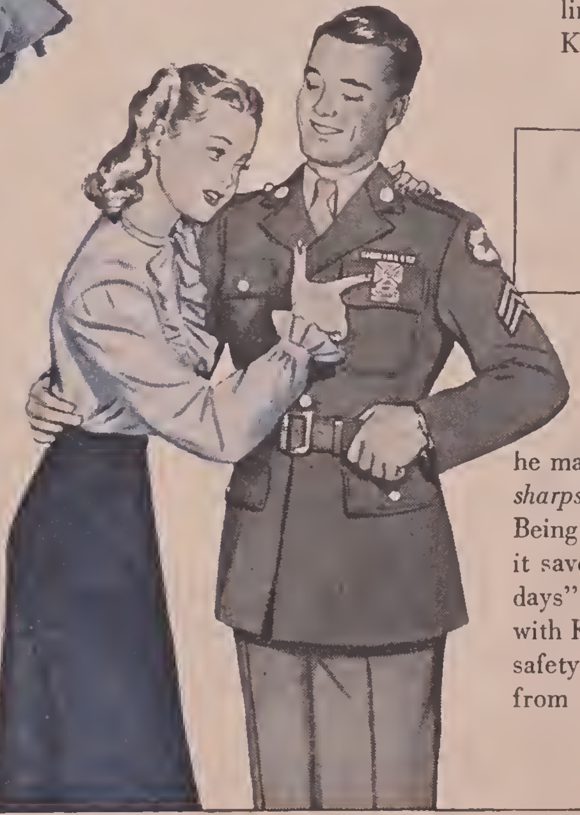
Let your dancing be light but not fantastic. Strangle-holds are tiring. Any exaggerated pose looks affected. So stand naturally, comfortably . . . for comfort is the first step toward dancing skill. That's why, on trying days, most prom-trotting girls choose cushion-soft Kotex sanitary napkins. They know there's all the difference in the world between Kotex and pads that just "feel" soft at first touch . . . because Kotex stays soft while wearing.

Would you entertain a mixed crowd with—
- ☐ Your snapshot album
- ☐ A radio concert
- ☐ A Valentine party

Hope you'd choose the Valentine party! To find partners, have your gang match halves of broken hearts. Make blindfolded couples hunt for candy mottos (a prize for the most). Cover your dartboard with a king-size heart, let everyone sling for top score. You can be a carefree hostess even on problem days, with the help of Kotex—for Kotex has patented ends—pressed flat, so they don't cause outlines. Not like thick, stubby pads, Kotex keeps your secret.

Between sets, do you preserve your wave—
- ☐ By combing only
- ☐ By brushing and combing
- ☐ By using a net

You can brush your wave and keep it, too. Best hair care calls for brushing and combing in direction hairdo will follow. Then wave can be gently coaxed into place. Fastidious grooming promotes your confidence. So does Kotex—the only napkin made to suit your own special needs. Only Kotex comes in 3 sizes, for different women, different days. Choose Regular Kotex in the blue box, Junior Kotex in the green box or Super Kotex in the brown box.



What medal is he wearing?
- ☐ Sharpshooter
- ☐ Purple Heart
- ☐ Congressional Medal

Every medal has a meaning you should know! Maybe he's been wounded in action, or awarded the highest military honor. Or, he may be a crack marksman—as the sharpshooter medal above tells you. Being sure saves embarrassment. And it saves needless dismay on "certain days" to be sure of extra protection—with Kotex—the napkin with the 4-ply safety center that keeps moisture away from the edges, assuring safety plus.

More women choose KOTEX* than all other sanitary napkins put together

LION'S ROAR

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

We're full of the milk of human kindness at this writing.

★ ★ ★ ★

We're gay, carefree. You can borrow money from us if you want to.

★ ★ ★ ★

In short, we're in good humor, and all because we've seen the most alluring musical motion picture since our movie-going began . . . M-G-M's "Meet Me In St. Louis".

★ ★ ★ ★

Whoops! Back you go to the old World's Fair in St. Louis as the guests of the Smith family, of which our favorite members are played by Judy Garland and Margaret O'Brien.

★ ★ ★ ★

What gay, nostalgic, wonderful entertainment this is, enriched in every scene by rainbow Technicolor!

★ ★ ★ ★

Judy Garland seems to have been born for the part of Esther, a high school girl just awakening to love—for the boy next door. Esther is young, innocent, vivacious, and golden-voiced.

★ ★ ★ ★

You will have to decide for yourself whether you prefer Judy's provocative presentation of a young girl in love or Judy's singing. Perhaps you'll find, as we did, both talents perfectly fused in "Over The Banister", "The Boy Next Door", or that bell-ringing success, "The Trolley Song". And these are only three of eight songs!

★ ★ ★ ★

Judy (that is, Esther) has a sister—an impish, devilish, utterly lovable kid named "Tootie". In this part, Margaret O'Brien will become everyone's sweetheart—if she isn't everyone's sweetheart already.

★ ★ ★ ★

Tom Drake, one of M-G-M's latest finds, plays the boy next door and heads a splendidly-chosen supporting cast including Mary Astor, Marjorie Main, Lucille Bremer, Joan Carroll, Henry H. Daniels, Jr., Leon Ames, and Harry Davenport.

★ ★ ★ ★

The script was written by Irving Brecher and Fred F. Finklehoffe. Arthur Freed, who gave us "Girl Crazy", produced, and Vincente Minnelli directed. They all have cause for pride.

★ ★ ★ ★

Mark our words: M-G-M's "Meet Me In St. Louis" will strike you as about the best tuneful repast ever displayed for your delight!

ROUND TEN:

It was quite a swank affair. Every cameraman in town was out with enough flashbulbs to have powered Diogenes' search for twenty years. Town cars rolled up to the theatre entrance for this gigantic preview (the title of the picture must remain incognito), and discharged bundles of mink, white ties and tailcoats. All the people in the bleachers said "Ah" at the proper intervals.

A tall man with a face like a captured town emerged from his car and turned to assist his wife, a handsome redhead. "Bogart!" yelled the bleachers. "And his missus."

His missus disengaged Mr. Bogart's helping hand with a caustic comment, which Mr. Bogart answered in a tone that would have made the Hollywood Bowl ring. In holy acrimony, the pair entered the theatre and were shown to their seats. The altercation continued for some moments, whereupon Mrs. Bogart arose and started haughtily down the aisle in the full stare of Hollywood. Mr. Bogart followed, to seize her elbow and tell her in terms unhallowed by the Hayes office, that she had better return to her seat like a little lady or he was going to conduct himself in a very, very physical manner to the everlasting detriment of some of her important teeth.

Mrs. Bogart returned to her seat in a silence in which a hundred pounds of fish could have been kept fresh for three years.

"The Battling Bogarts are at it again," someone who knew them well said with a sigh. "It's a good thing they are married to each other because such titantic arguments would normally reduce one or the other combatant to a pulp."

Eventually, someone weakened, and the Bogarts announced their separation and their pending divorce. One of the most turbulent of marriages had been given the final gong. It had been the second marriage for Mayo Methot, and the third for Humphrey Bogart The local Big Brains are saying that the fourth Mrs. Bogart has been selected in Bogey's mind's eye.

TIE THAT:

Jack Benny, deep in the South Pacific, found that the two gags—out of some that he had expected to bring abdominal guffaws—most successful were these: Upon holding up a picture of Fred Allen in one of his most doleful poses, Jack would observe lugubriously, "Well, fellows, here's what you're fighting for."

The other gag involved no props. "Everything is the same in The States as it was when you left," he would announce heartily. "Roosevelt is still President, Ann Sheridan is still beautiful, and Allen's program is still lousy."

Like Bob Hope, Jack sometimes felt that he had never left home. His guide in New Guinea was Captain Lanny Ross, and the chap who announced his New Caledonia broadcast was Marine Sergeant Jack Briggs.

IT'S A DATE, GATE:

It is a rule in the Gene Raymond-Jeanette MacDonald household that Captain Raymond will attend to all minor household repairs whenever he manages to get up to Los Angeles on week-end leave. (He is presently based at Yuma, Arizona.)

Captain Gene Raymond, in England nearly a year, now stationed at Yuma, Arizona.

One evening not so long ago, his wife was quietly reading when she heard an old familiar refrain. A lost motorist had scorched up a rustic roadway, only to find that it ended abruptly at the Raymond-MacDonald gate. Before he could apply his brakes, he had crashed into the white-washed pickets.

Jeannette had just returned to the house after an inspection of the shattered portal when her husband telephoned to say that he would be home that weekend. "Stop somewhere along the way, dear," said Mrs. Raymond, "and buy some white paint, nails, boards, and all that stuff—you know."

"That gate again for the eighth or tenth time, huh?"

"Yes, dear."

"Well, I suppose I can't kick. A lot of army guys would be very happy if, while they were gone, the little woman would give all strangers the gate."

GROWING PAINS:

Unhappiest girl on election day was June Allyson—not because she was dissatisfied with the election outcome, but because she couldn't vote. She didn't become 21 until October 7, one day too late for her to register in Los Angeles.

visiting friend, Sue and Alan Ladd employed a one-night butler from a highly recommended agency. This butler proved to be a hostess' dream: he was tall, austere of appearance, elegant of accent, and polished by years of experience. He assumed command instantly and in no time everything was moving along smoothly.

So smoothly, in fact, that Sue only wondered fleetingly what on earth this paragon of serving virtues could be doing, when she caught sight of him emerging from the shrubbery near the Play House. Thirty minutes later, when she saw him repeat the performance, she decided to investigate. Neatly placed side by side in the tall grass beside the bushes were four bottles of cheer, purloined from the party stock.

Sue promptly paid him off. "But, Mrs. Ladd, I can give you an explanation," he protested indignantly when she explained her objection to his spirited conduct.

"That is an explanation I should like to hear," she said with wry humour.

"Well, your guests are just wasting the beverages you are serving," he said hotly. "They don't appreciate good things. Now, I do!"

STREET SCENE:

The wind had blown her hair into a tumble; she wore no make-up except a quick swatch of lipstick, now almost obliterated. By one reluctant hand she drew a chubby, protesting small boy across the street. "Please, Bobby, hurry, before the signal changes."

"But I don't want to have my hair cut," clamored the youngster.

"Well, you're going to have it cut, so just behave," was the answer from the harassed girl who might have been any sorely beset young mother dealing with a strong-minded young son. She hoisted him over the curb and struggled down the street.

No one recognized her as Academy-Award winner, Jennifer Jones.

ANDY HARDY'S BLONDE WITHOUT TROUBLE:

The new Mrs. Mickey Rooney, in case you haven't seen pictures of her, is beautiful, blonde, 5 feet 9 inches tall, weighs 120 pounds, is 17 years old, won the Miss Birmingham (Alabama) title in 1944, and was Betty Jane Rase before her marriage. Perhaps the most indicative fact about her is that she and Mickey were married by the minister of the church at which Betty Jane has attended Sunday School since she was first enrolled.

ALIENATION CONFIRMATION:

The long rumored estrangement of Carole Landis and Major Thomas Wallace was confirmed recently, to the distress of ardent romantics everywhere. Theirs was a storybook romance, and it is to be hoped that when the war is over and some sort of ordinary home-life can be reestablished, they will reconcile.

CONSTANCE BENNETT AND GILBERT ROLAND, long known in Hollywood to be separated, made it official in a joint announcement to the newspapers.

DEVOTION DEPARTMENT:

It was Thursday on the set of "Duffy's Tavern," picture in production at Paramount. Barry Sullivan, not needed in a scene, slipped away to the paymaster's window, then to the bank, and then to Billie Benesche's shop—a spot that is, in an upper bracket sort of way,

SCENES SEEN ABOUT TOWN:

June Allyson and Dick Powell at the Alan Ladds' stupendous party.

Captain Ronald Reagan and Jane Wyman at the same party—Jane looking like a fugitive from Heaven in a white moire dinner dress, strapless, and trimmed with narrow bands of mink.

Bill Eythe, bearded for "Czarina", at the party with Nina Foch; John Payne with Gloria de Haven; Dick Crane stag because his lovely Kay was away; Marjorie Reynolds looking radiant because Captain Jack Reynolds had just returned from three months of dodging robombs in England; Helmut Dantine lamenting the fact that he can't escape his Nazi roles. Even in the remake of "Petrified Forest" he plays, not the American gangster as the story was originally written, but an international crook with Nazi overtones; Deanna Durbin, stunning with her new blonde-auburn hair; Jeanne Crain and Lon McCallister going back to the lavish buffet for second helpings of turkey; Betty Hutton, being greeted in stentorian manner by her boss, Buddy de Sylva, and telling him to mind his manners or be smeared with lipstick; Big Jim Brown with his fragilely beautiful wife; Barry Sullivan with laughing Mrs. Sullivan, who refuses to wear her glasses when she attends a party, so has to have Barry point out the guests as they enter so that— in her congenial way—she can wave; Sonny Tufts with his statuesque Mrs.; Judy Garland trying to get someone on the telephone, dialing repeatedly; Gail Russell looking shy, and being told by an about-to-be-married Air Force Pilot, just returned from 13 months in Africa, that she had the type of eyes to make a prospective bridegroom review the question of his nuptials very carefully. And everyone in general having a copasetic time.

"There is more room for newcomers in the writing field today than ever before. Some of the greatest of writing men and women have passed from the scene in recent years. Who will take their places? Movieland's NEW PICTURE GUIDE

5 BEST PICTURES OF THE MONTH ON PAGE 60

LAURA (20th Century-Fox) comes to us as "another mystery," at a time when mysteries are what we have most of, speaking film-wise (and otherwise); yet as such, it needs no apology.

For it's one of the best—competing and comparing most favorably. It has sheer suspense aplenty, a well-written story, and an experienced cast well-directed.

Gene Tierney comes back to the screen in the title role, beautiful as ever—and more than ever before, an actress. Dana Andrews underplays somewhat, as the detective assigned to solve Laura's murder—but that's not to say that he doesn't do it intentionally. It's our guess that he does, and with praiseworthy results.

Vincent Price is superb, too, as the fiancé who behaves like a heel—and knows it; and Judith Anderson is excellent as always, as the woman who knows the heel for what he is, and feels she's better able than Laura Hunt to afford such a husband.

But for all that it's difficult to point out any single performer for special credit, Clifton Webb (in his first movie role, after years on Broadway) rates more than an equal share of the honors. It's he, playing Waldo Lydecker—columnist, collector, cynic and satirist—who's probably most of all responsible for lifting this far above the usual run of murder mysteries.

ENTER ARSENE LUPIN (Universal) classifies as a mystery-adventure tale. Based on the Maurice LeBlanc character—the international crook who, for all his rascality, was such a romantic sort of rogue — the story opens with a scene on a European train that's "speeding through the night."

Charles Korvin—new handsome, six-foot leading man recruited for the screen from the New York stage—has the title role, and Ella Raines is the girl he pursues to London. Lupin's thievery, you'll gather, is somewhat incidental to his romantic pursuits; and like Robin Hood of old, his crimes are committed with charitable intent.

All the same, he gives Scotland Yard and the French police a merry chase, and we think you'll like it—with J. Carrol Naish, Gale Sondergaard and George Dolenz in the supporting roles.

AND NOW TOMORROW (Paramount). For the second time in her cinematic life, Loretta Young portrays the helplessness of the deaf—and withal convincingly, though one has the feeling the story has handed her a tragedy exaggerated out of all proportion to the affliction.

Alan Ladd co-stars with Loretta, as the young medico who restores her hearing, falls in love with her, and makes everything turn out "just fine, thanks."

The Rachel Field novel on which the film is based is the story of Emily Blair (Loretta Young), pampered daughter of the wealthy New England Blairs of Blairstown. Until the eve of a party announcing her engagement to Jeff Stoddard (Barry Sullivan), when she is struck with meningitis and resulting deafness, Emily has always had the usual "everything." Comes then two years of traveling to specialists all over the world—alas, she tries to buy back her hearing, but fails. And there, as already explained, is where Dr. Ladd comes in!

Susan Hayward, always the beautiful minx, doubles as Emily's sister and "the other woman." Which is to say that there are romantic complications before the happy ending; also a few other interruptions and intrusions, making for a lagging of pace here and there, though not enough to complain about.

IRISH EYES ARE SMILING (20th Century-Fox). A Technicolor musical of the type most popular now—the innovation from feeble books formerly written about raising money to keep the landlord from closing the hall on opening night currently being to tell a story about an American composer and the tunes from his pen.

"Irish Eyes" is one of these, produced by the new formula, and waxing biographical about Ernest R. Ball, who wrote some of the loveliest ballads during the first two decades of the century, notably "Mother Machree" and "When Irish Eyes Are Smiling."

Dick Haymes has the Ernie Ball role, and sings it with all due sentiment, besides turning in the straight-acting performance credited as having boosted him to stardom on the 20th lot. The "conflict," if you can call it that, consists of breaking up the composer and his girl (June Haver), then trying to get them together again—which happens, of course, but not until the end.

Blonde-beautiful June Haver rates some song and dance applauses, and Monte Woolley, caustic as usual but more than usually soft-hearted and benevolent, is a noteworthy addition in the interest of humor.

BOWERY TO BROADWAY (Universal) is just what the title says. And it's another roseate exercise in nostalgia for days that are gone but not forgotten, a delightful revival of the gay and colorful. It's top-drawer entertainment, delivering a fair share of sighs, cries and chuckles, for all that it runs a little on the thin side when it comes to big dramatic situations.

Opening on the Bowery, in 1895, it takes Mike O'Rourke (Jack Oakie) and Denny Dugan (Donald Cook) through their series of fights, competitions and alternating triumphs. It gives you Lillian Russell (Louise Allbritton), singing "Under the Bamboo Tree," plus the Dancing Kirbys (Rosemary De Camp and Frank McHugh); Peggy Ryan and Donald O'Connor, as themselves; Maria Montez, as Marina, the European star; Susanna Foster, as Peggy, "the girl with the million dollar legs"; and Turhan Bey as Ted, the boy who writes her music, and falls in love with her.

I'LL BE SEEING YOU (Vanguard, released through United Artists) is the story of Mary Marshall (Ginger Rogers), on Christmas furlough from prison, and Sgt. Zachary Morgan (Joseph Cotten), on furlough from the Army hospital where he is under treatment as a neuropsychiatric.

Mary and Zach meet—the girl serving a manslaughter sentence meeting the soldier recovering from the strain of combat in the South Pacific. They're enroute to Pinehill, where Mary will spend the holidays with her Aunt Mary (Spring Byington) and Uncle Henry Marshall (Tom Tully), and their daughter, Barbara (Shirley Temple.

It's a love story, developed under these unusual circumstances; hope renewed through the adventures of their ten-day double furlough, aided by the kindly and steadying influence of the Marshall family.

LIGHTS OF OLD SANTA FE (Republic)

Will Roy Rogers (flanked by Trigger, of course, and the Sons of the Pioneers) get the girl?

Will the heroine (Dale Evans) lose her rodeo?

Will the villain (Richard Powers) trick her into marrying him?

For the exciting answers to all these questions, and more too, see "Lights of Old Santa Fe." Incidentally, Roy and the "Sons" give out with some snappy tunes, like "I'm a Happy Guy in My Levi Britches" and "Trigger Hasn't Got a Pretty Figger."

THREE IS A FAMILY (United Artists) but due to the exigencies of wartime living, the Mitchell family rapidly increases to ten.

The original three (Fay Bainter and Charlie Ruggles, as the Mitchells, and Helen Broderick as Irma, the very funny and much complaining "poor relation") are living together, more or less cozily, in an apartment just fitting their needs. Then daughter, Kitty (Marjorie Reynolds), and her twins (Donna and Elissa Lambertson) come home for the duration. When their son, Archie (Arthur Lake), and his expectant wife (Jeff Donnell) are given notice to vacate their apartment because of a no-children clause in their lease, there's only one solution—a house.

As though a miracle, a house is found, and the elated family figuratively thumb their collective noses at the manager—until the down-payment check bounces. (Charlie has "forgotten" to mention that he invested their $2,500 bank balance in a business venture.) The family is on the point of total evacuation, when Kitty's husband comes home on leave and the "expected one" begins to arrive. (Not even a hospital room can be had.)

Already bursting at the seams, the apartment now has to expand to accommodate the near-sighted doctor (John Philliber), and another expectant couple, invited by Kitty's rashly generous husband.

Hattie McDaniel, as the tippling maid, the last of a long succession, adds much to the humor and her bulk to the impression that the apartment is just a small scale Grand Central Station.

Direction, dialogue, and excellent performances by the entire cast add up to making this package excellent entertainment, with a slight touch of the slapstick.

THE CONSPIRATORS (Warner Bros.) bears resemblance to the Frederic Prokosch novel in almost no respect, except that the characters keep the same names, and it continues to be set in Lisbon.

Paul Henreid as Vincent, the hero involved in a plot of international spying and counter-spying, and Hedy Lamarr, as his Russian girl sweetheart, contrive, with the "help" of the writer adapters, to turn a story of power and importance into an only mildly dramatic situation with love-interest.

Meeting a similar fate by this treatment, too, are the novelist's other characterizations—Quintanilla (Sidney Greenstreet) becomes no more than a gang leader; Bernazsky (Peter Lorre), one of his stooges. So nearly missing as to be almost entirely absent from this version are the hope and despair appeals of the original story; the ideals that justified Vincent's revenge motive, however sordid and murderous. What results may not be entirely disappointing, for those who aren't judging it on a comparative basis; still, given such an exciting, compelling story, what a waste, that it should be so completely changed in the interpreting of it.

THE RIGHT TRACK FOR TEENS

EVERY girl between the ages of fourteen and twenty-one is lovely to look at. If she isn't, it's her own fault! Who says so? None other than Joyce Reynolds, one of the shining stars in Warner Bros. "Hollywood Canteen." Here's how Joyce, who looks the way every young girl should, proves her point.

A slim, straight figure—the pin-up kind—can't be had for the asking. But it will be the proud possession of any right-minded miss who stoops and bends in regular rhythm for fifteen minutes out of the day; who keeps one eye on a calorie chart and the other on the milk and greens that build strong bones.

A complexion need never be a calamity. It won't be, either, if it's well cared for with frequent daily soap and water washings and the tender touch of a light lubricating cream.

There shouldn't be a dull moment. There never is when a pretty face is pointed up with the proper make-up. Or when good grooming and perfect posture take the place of bobby socks and a sloppy stride.

The right kind of make-up begins with a base. Just be sure your neck doesn't get left out of the picture, says Joyce.

The right sort of coiffure starts with healthy, glossy hair. For this you need to shampoo often and brush every day.

The right impression calls to well-kept hands. And nails look so much nicer with a pretty coat of polish.

The right type of smile is wreathed in rosy lipstick. The "wreath" will be smoother if done with a brush

PICTURES IN PRODUCTION

AT WARNER BROTHERS:

SAN ANTONIO is still the picture with chicken trouble. During the entire shooting schedule on an alleged Texas street, the cackling of fowls, necessary for atmosphere, has spoiled many a take. Finally Director David Butler observed over the mike one day, "The local chickens have laid more eggs in this picture than has Mr. Flynn."

OF HUMAN BONDAGE. Paul Henreid, Eleanor Parker, Alexis Smith and Patric Knowles are still working in this. The costumes worn by the women are out of this era—quite mad (what's so different about that?). At any rate, Director Edmund Goulding undertook to coach Eleanor Parker in a scene the other day and found that he lacked atmosphere. "Loan me your hat, Eleanor," he commanded, then donning it in the best Tom Brenaman manner, he explained—with full emotional projection—what he expected of the scene. His actors, deep in hysterics, didn't get much out of the demonstration.

PILLAR TO POST is still in the making with Ida Lupino, Sydney Greenstreet, Bill Prince, and Johnny Mitchell. In one scene, Ida was presumably walking along a street when an outrageous urchin dropped a sack of water on her head. After having been thoroughly drenched several times, Ida was told that the cameraman was ready for close-ups. He wanted her to register extreme distaste as wetly as possible. Just before she was to utter her first line, a prop man dashed a full pitcher of water into her face. The scene was a lily (perfect on first take) a/c Miss Lupino's honest reaction to such dramatic prompting.

THE BIG SLEEP stars the newest and most exciting local romantic couple, Humphrey Bogart and Lauren Bacall. The set has been closed to everyone, including the publicity department. John Ridgely (playing a heavy for the first time in his life) was wanted for a magazine interview on the set. He explained his unavailability on one sound stage, and his accessibility on another as follows, "You can't get to me in The Big Sleep, but I'm as free as air where God Is My Co-Pilot."

They'll Be Seeing You

Dinah Shore, reporting for the G.I.'s she visited in France; their dreams, things they think about—their story

By MAXINE ARNOLD

The Dinah Shor
S 20327610

Dinah, all decked out in regulation G.I. gear for touring the foxhole circuit. A "costume picture," would you say?

Pasture performances, given from the rear of a truck, were her specialty; she also did a show at the Versailles Palace.

Home again! A happy Dinah and George gather in their "corn crop" in the backyard of their Beverly Hills home—mighty tasty fare for a gal who's been on a K-rations diet!

Six weeks on tour, and she slept under a roof only six nights; for the rest, just a bedroll.

End of the journey, and welcomed by her own G.I. guy, Corporal George Montgomery.

They'll Be Seeing You

"THEY'LL be seeing you . . . in all the old familiar places . . . that that heart of theirs embraces . . . all day through . . ."

Yes, they'll be seeing you. That's the favorite of G.I.'s everywhere in France today; the song they most wanted Dinah to sing. And that's the message they asked her to bring back to you.

"And," says Dinah, "just be sure that you and all those old familiar places are still there! Everything about you, everything at home—just the way it was when they went away. Nothing changed. No new hair-do. No new paint job on the house. Not even an ash tray moved.

"They remember every curl on your head, every plank in that house. Bless 'em," drawls Dinah, with a catch in her voice. "They have a mental map of everything with them in those foxholes. The worn spot in the carpet you catch your toe in as you come in the door. The snapshot of you on the end table made one day at the beach. The big plaster dog with the stud collar he won years ago at a carnival, used since as a door stop.

"That's all he's had to think about all these months. And brother, has he done some tall thinkin'! So don't buy a new rug. Don't go and 'pretty up' the house because he's comin' home. And DON'T move that plaster dog—that's one of the first things he'll start lookin' for when he comes in the door."

Dinah says the boys worry a lot about how things may be changed, back in the States, when they come home. All the G.I.'s asked her the latest news about the states they came from, and their home town. Always the same questions—from boys from Georgia, Oklahoma, Indiana, and all over. Were the States still there? Had she been to their home town lately? Had it changed?

"Bless 'em," Dinah said again. "Makes you wonder just where in the heck they thought the States had gone!"

We were in the cozy study of her Beverly Hills home. Dinah was wearing dark blue slacks and a pink blouse, which she said made her feel "so sort of undressed," after moving around in so much G.I. gear. And she was remembering like a montage the messages the boys had given her to bring home. The mass blur of faces that sent them.

"If you have time, Miss Shore, would you drop a note to Mom when you get back and tell her I'm okay, not to worry, and I'll be seein' her?" Other notes too, scribbled against a tree in France, or on a tank stopped momentarily on the road to war.

Dinah's own G.I.—Corporal George Montgomery, who is stationed near Hollywood now and happened to be home for lunch—was spending his lunch-hour out in the backyard, working on the carburetor of his car that sputtered and wouldn't run. He made a point of of dropping back and forth through the room where we sat talking, and looking towards Dinah . . . just to convince himself that she was really safe again and back home.

"Hello, honey. How's the carburetor comin'? Need any help?" Dinah would say, flashing him a smile that should rehabilitate most anything—including carburetors.

Who, better than Dinah, to bring back those messages from boys to home folks here? To those G.I.'s Dinah Shore is HOME TOWN, U. S. A. It's all there in her voice; those torchy tones so soothing, so human, and so warm the boys say that it melts Spam in the cans.

She's done a heap of travellin' with those boys, in the past weeks, moving with the army up toward the Front . . . when the "Front" might be any hedgerow ahead, with Jerries on three sides and Dinah just hoping they wouldn't be on four sides before the troupe had finished giving the show. Jolting along nineteen hours at a whack in those trucks, following the tiny red catlights of some vehicle ahead, and hoping they weren't following Germans instead of somebody on their own side.

As the tanks and Caissons kept rolling along, Dinah rolled with them. Eating K-rations, sleeping on a blanket and bed roll; "scrounging" around (meaning to swap for clothes, boots, helmets and stuff) until she was finally equipped and looked rugged enough to take on a tank or so of her own—but if the truth were known, feeling about as rugged as a paper doll inside. Singing with a wobbly heart to homesick G.I.'s who collected by the thousands from out of nowhere into those French forests. Singing to foxhole foursomes, or on the steps of the Palace of (Continued on page 77)

It's General Omar Bradley here; she also met General Patton.

Dinah joined Der Bingle Crosby and they did a show together, at Chalons-sur-Marne.

The "Belle of the Yukon" (title of her current movie), and NBC singing star—this billing is just "a G.I. on wash day."

Starred in "Make Your Own Bed" and funnier than ever in "Hollywood Canteen," Jack Carson is scheduled next for "Stolen Life."

It's his business to be funny. But according to those who know him best, and should know, his "funny business" isn't always for business!

JACK the Ribber

I CAN believe that friends of Jack Carson have threatened to carve "Laugh this one off!" on his tombstone, comes the time for his epitaph. Such retaliation may provide some small comfort for the many gags they have suffered at the hands of Hollywood's No. 1 ribber. Even his devoted songstress wife, Kay St. Germaine, still is heard to say she should have crowned the guy, not married him!

Kay's initiation into the ranks of Jack's nerve-shattered victims dates back to 1939, when he was courting her. They were out driving one afternoon and he had just popped the question.

"There is one thing I must tell you, in all fairness, before you answer," he warned her seriously. "I've never mentioned it to you because both mother and I are rather sensitive about it, but Carson isn't my real name. My real name is—Emil Lipschitz!"

"So what?" said Kay instantly. "Lots of people change their names, especially comedians. Jack Benny, everyone knows, is really Benny Kubelsky. Why should it matter to me whether your name is Carson or Lipschitz? Don't give it another thought."

Jack sighed happily. "Gosh, honey, that's wonderful," he said. "I wish you'd tell mother how you feel about it. I know it would make her very happy."

Several days later Kay and Mrs. Carson met. In her sweetest voice Kay said, "Don't worry, Mrs. Carson. I know your real name is (Continued on page 68)

It's the pipes that get you first. Jean Arthur, with a dash of Andy Devine. It comes out cute, and on June it sounds good.

Then it's the hair. Honest-to-gosh, untouched-by-human-hands blonde! Her teeth actually look as if they were made exclusively for her face and not for display in a credit dentist's window. Her eyes brought forth a "Twink" monicker from young Margaret O'Brien. (And little Maggie's right!)

Just where all the gal's pep comes from must be a military secret, since she eats like a boid. A healthy canary could put her to shame with a one-day ration of cuttlebone. She seems to thrive on nothing but half-cups of coffee, conversation, and a lusty love of life.

If we wanted to get analytical about this latter point, we could cite the case of the falling tree, of broken Allyson bones, and the long recuperation in bed when June was nine. The doctors waggled their sage heads and mumbled something about her never walking again. From that moment on, June wanted to walk, and determined to live. She made up her mind then to enjoy every minute of life, while she could.

Five long years later, she was not only walking, but was swimming champ at her high school in Westchester, New York.

Westchester, itself, paid little attention to June, born Jan on October 7th, 1923. Because she was hospital-ridden for so long, nobody else paid much court to her, either. So, as soon as she could, she wangled permission from her mother to move to a New York City girls' club and carve out a place for herself under the local sun.

It was in New York that she sat through eighteen showings of the Rogers-Astaire musical, "The Gay Divorcee", and at the end of the running, calmly announced to a girl friend, "I've learned all these dance routines, and I've practiced every day, and now I can dance as well as Fred Astaire."

The girl friend gave her one of those long looks. "Yeah?" she said. "Prove it!"

We'll be generous and say she did prove it. At any rate, she found out the "Sing Out the News" company was auditioning chorus girls at a local theater, and set out to grab herself a job. The fact that a girl dances to music, and carries her own accompaniment with her, didn't phase June at all.

"That's all right," she told the dance director, explaining the omission. "I do a different kind of routine. I dance without music!"

Nobody had an answer for that one, so June got the job and got herself on the payroll as a chorus girl. She will tell you, herself, that when the line wound up at stage right, almost anyone could point out left and say, "June went thataway!"

Only four-feet-eleven at the time, June became a show-girl in the spot Don Loper and his partner had in the show. She managed to stagger across the stage under one of those fabulous show hats, which always brought a howl from rehearsal spectators. Little did she know, at the time, that she was just comic relief. But her legs that couldn't keep up with the tall gals' strides and she soon found herself confronted by the director and a "Why don't you go back to school?" mandatory request.

Two days before the show opened, she was back in the line. "Only because there was the usual shortage of chorus girls," she assures you, honestly.

"Sing Out the News" was finally weathered and was followed by "Very Warm for May," "Higher and Higher," "Panama Hattie," and "Best Foot Forward."

When Betty Hutton came down with measles during the "Hattie" run, June took her place, but it wasn't until her opening shot in "Best Foot Forward" that she was pursued to her dressing room by a panting talent scout, who waved the inevitable contract before her eyes. Two weeks later, Hollywood met June in person.

June loves clothes, but doesn't buy for herself without counsel.

The onswer is os simple as ABC—no tickets, no gosoline!

Impressed with her sock personality, M-G-M-ers wrote in a fat part for her in "Best Foot Forward."

"Come back tomorrow," they said, "after you clear up your cold. Your voice can't record well that deep."

June gulped and announced casually (she hoped) that she had no cold and was stuck with the voice God gave her. The writers looked at each other under raised eyebrows, then scowled at June, who stood there with her frog in her throat. But they gave her the part, and a few more, until she ran off with honors for "Two Girls and a Sailor."

"My voice is still the same," June says, "but people hardly ever look surprised now when it comes out bass."

At home, June fancies herself a combination General Eisenhower and explorer Vasco de Gama. Surrounded by maps of all sizes, shapes, colors and nationalities, she alternately ponders war strategy and post-war world tours.

Her post-war world cruises are fanciful things, but she's dead serious about them. Tour No. 1, made by windjammer, will take the roving Allyson from the Port of Los Angeles, through the Panama Canal to Europe. Then she'll cruise through the Mediterranean, across the Atlantic, around the Horn to Hawaii and the Philippines. Tour No. 2 is still in the formative stage, but we'll report on that one as soon as the itinerary has been mapped out.

Not a passive dreamer, June plans to take up navigation, next year. She's boning up on math now, in preparation. She's currently taking Spanish, and practices on Bess Vandyke, her companion-housekeeper. Reeling off sentences, June makes with a charming and confusing jargon of Spanish, the king's English, and Hollywoodese. "Hey, Bess, honey," she yells, "be a dear, dear, and bring me el plume!"

Friends run riot through the Allyson life. But most of them are neatly catalogued. For instance, there is the book friend, the furniture-moving friend, the boating friend, and so on. Far from snobbish, this is a sensible and progressive social innovation. Even the nicest guys may be more friendly over the dinner table than at the theater, more fun over a backgammon board than poring over a weighty tome.

June's furniture-moving pal lives in a Beverly Hills apartment, just beneath her own. She bangs on the floor twice and the friend rushes upstairs, on the double. The two of them spend a few healthy hours shoving the furniture around, and then the friend goes back downstairs and doesn't see our June again until she plays knock-knock on the floor again, about a month later.

Once a month, June visits her book friend, lugging a huge, empty box. She fills the box with his best recommended books, and takes them (Continued on page 69)

Stalwart Storky

Richard Crane's the name—"Storky", his friends call him. He's "flyin' right,", sure 'nough, and getting places fast!

AS YOU may have noticed—if you have recently bent ear to your radio, your fellow students, fellow workers, or co-barracks mates—this nation is engaged primarily in the manufacture of humor. Iceland may be the land of the midnight sun; ours is the land of the free-wheeling pun. In England, the high-rider may come a cropper; here he always produces a topper.

Ergo, it was inevitable that a chap who registered on the first day of school as Richard Crane should promptly be nicknamed "Storky." The stork is a bird (in case you don't know, because you were found under a rose bush or produced from a doctor's little black satchel) with long legs, an unreasonable love of speed, and a record of excessive accomplishment.

Stalwart Storky Crane satisfies all three stipulations. He is now 5′ 10½″ tall and weighs 170 pounds. So long and efficient are his legs that he went through high school in the following suits: football, baseball, track, and swimming trunks, each outfit requiring a different but equally

I LIKE: Gardenias, lemon meringue pie, church bells, peanuts, bonfires, the sound of the sea at night, and things to wear in my hair.

I DON'T CARE FOR: Ghost stories, but I love tales of suspense and mystery;
Hats, half-hats, any hat. I never wear anything but beanies;
Costume jewelry. I like to wear one nice ring, a watch or an identification bracelet. Of course, I like all service insignia—airman's wings, submarine dolphins, the turrets of the engineers and so on.

I USED TO: Like train whistles, but I've traveled so much lately I'm beginning to hate them;
Have fun with parlor magic; I was always begging people to pull the little red cord, open the envelope, or whatever, and getting a kick out of the usually disconcerting results. Now card tricks are my limit, and they must be simple or I baffle myself;
Design wardrobes on doll models; now I confine myself to suggestions for my own clothes.

YOU were awarded the coveted role of Dorian Gray in Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's "The Picture of Dorian Gray" through your amazing ability to read and memorize, speech for speech, the entire story in twenty-four hours.

You stayed up overnight, turning the book into a one-man play and, the very next morning, put on an entire two-hour show for the director. You found yourself repeating the performance that very same afternoon for the producer of the picture, and got the part in three minutes flat.

You were given the role of Lao San, youngest of Lin Tan's sons in "Dragon Seed," because "Dorian Gray" wasn't quite ready.

You have no use whatsoever for narrow-minded, over-materialistic and too business-minded people.

Your unusual acting ability and remarkable memory comes from being a pupil for five years of the celebrated Russian teacher of dramatics, Actor Michael Chekhov. You learned concentration from him by having, among other things, to stare at a coin or a purse on a table for two hours, and thinking about it to the exclusion of everything else!

You named your cocker-spaniel Brontë, because, with her hair parted down the middle, she reminds you of all three of the sisters.

FATE and PHYLLIS THAXTER

By LESLIE TRAINE

THINGS are there for you—or they are not.

That's the way Phyllis Thaxter, newest Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer discovery, feels about it.

"Life is terribly exciting," she declared, her hazel-brown eyes all but emitting sparks. "At the right time, things come to you. No use struggling and pining, trying to get something you're not meant to have. . . . I believe in Fate!"

Fate has been pretty busy in Phyllis' short life. Laurette Taylor, the Lunts, Sydney Greenstreet, Rose Franken and Mervyn LeRoy have all taken tremendous interest in her career, and each has helped to advance it. Mervyn LeRoy, now directing Phyllis in her first screen role in "Thirty Seconds Over Toyko," insists that she is one of the world's great actresses. Mervyn discovered Clark Gable and Lana Turner, among others, and he should know.

The Stocking King of Hollywood, Willys has toiled and also spun, gilding the most gorgeous gams in the world. Nice work if you can get it, and he got it . . . and this is his story

By DOROTHY DEERE

EVERY TIME a young lady, anywhere, contemplates her sheerly-sheathed ankle with satisfaction —and every time a young man does ditto—she or he unconsciously pays tribute to the artistry of one Willys, a gentleman who has done more to improve the scenery on windy street-corners than any other single genius in the world.

As the uncrowned Stocking King of Hollywood, Willys is hosiery stylist for 90 per cent of the pictures made there, and it is safe to say there isn't a pair of feminine legs flashing across the screen that hasn't been glorified by his product. It can also be said there isn't a pair of feminine legs off-screen today that isn't wearing lovelier, lighter, better-fitting hose because of his work in eliminating imperfections displeasing to the camera eye.

In 1923, when a young man named Willy De Mond graduated from Textile School in New York and opened a small store on Clinton street, ladies' leg-coverings ran a discreet gamut of black, brown and white (and a lady never went bare-legged!). The young man had ideas of his own, the most startling being a color range of some fifteen shades, including red and blue. When he specified to a New York silk mill that he wanted some of these woven in mesh and jacquard patterns, he was accorded the same treatment given the Wright brothers when they said they could fly. Not only was it unconventional, he was told—it was crazy!

For a while, the weavers were perfectly right. For a few months the examples of his genius languished unsold in the Clinton street window. Then Willys took a box of samples and invaded New York's backstage regions to contact the beauties with whom exposing their extremities was an art. Seymour Felix, dance director for Ziegfeld then, and dance director of such screen classics as "Cover Girl" today, helped him make his first sale.

Displayed by Eddie Cantor's "Kid Boots" queens, variegated colors and patterns soon became a fad. Before long, Willys had added an "s" to his front name, installed brother Max, sister Celia and a force of eleven other people in his store, and was weaving his own. Ziegfeld, Schubert, Schwab and Mandel, Belasco, Hammerstein, George White and Earl Carroll productions were all relying on him for their hosiery creations. In 1927, he designed the Black Bottom Stocking for Ann Pennington's dance of the same name, and thereby made the whole nation hosiery-conscious.

Even as late as 1930, stockings worn by the screen stars were imperfect. Norma Shearer proves the point. See?

When Willys came to Hollywood in 1930, screen stars were still covering their limbs with something almost as thick, and with more rings in it, than tree-bark. The heavily-encrusted seed-pearl-and-lace hose designed for Bebe Daniels to wear for her real-life wedding to actor Ben Lyons were as nifty a superproduction as even his own looms could manage. Comparing them with the cobwebs spun for screen wear today, and available (in pre-war times) to any off-screen hosiery shopper, is proof positive that tempus has fugited—in stocking feet!

Improvement in equipment, plus silk, rayon and nylon development, is of course directly responsible for general improvement. Many of hosiery's "brightest ideas," however, were innovations created by Hollywood's Columbus of the Calves while solving the problem of a particular star in a particular picture.

The most widely pictured hose in the world; made for Alice Faye, at $2500.

Leslie Brooks (right) and Ann Miller are co-holders of the "perfect legs" title. Both are Columbia actresses.

The lace toe and lace heel were created so that Ginger Rogers might properly show off the open-toed shoes she wore on her dancing feet in "International." Later, the complete sandal-foot stocking was designed to suit the personal preference of Marlene Dietrich, the screen colony's most fabulous stocking buyer—and eventually that, too, hit the open market. The iridescent-shaded stocking, popular for awhile, was created for Grace Moore to wear in "One Night of Love."

For Claudette Colbert's famous hitch-hike scene in "It Happened One Night" it was discovered that she must wear a dark stocking, minus the shine, that, in a close-up, would cause camera-trouble. In experimenting, Willys developed the ombre hose, shaded light at the front and growing darker at the back. The off-black shade known as gunmetal was the further development of that memorable moment in which Claudette upped her skirt and affected traffic, both on the screen and

NICE GIRL

FOR more than two of the three years she has been under contract to Warner Bros. studio, Eleanor Parker spent most of her time portraying roles calculated to prove, beyond a doubt, that no man in his right senses would be ashamed to have her as his sister.

It was a great surprise to Eleanor, since she had specialized in character parts during her Pasadena Community Playhouse days, and before that in summer stock at Martha's Vineyard and at the Cleveland Playhouse. Her best roles were as witches, scrubwomen, menaces, grandmothers and even old men. As a matter of fact, she never played a straight role in her life until she signed a movie contract on her nineteenth birthday, three years ago last June. Then, all of a sudden, she was playing nothing else but.

Two things happened to save her, and turned the last year into triumph. (It started with her role in "Between Two Worlds," went on to the lead in "The Very Thought of You," and ended in her present assignment as the anything-but-nice-girl, Mildred, in "Of Human Bondage.") First, the discovery that Eleanor could act. Second, her rejection by the male portion of the public as a ready-made "sister." They took a good look at Eleanor on the screen, and screamed frantically for pin-up pictures.

"I still haven't any to send out," Eleanor says. "—not a single shot in shorts, bathing suit, or even a glamorous formal. You see, the studio was building me as a nice girl. All my portraits were aimed at proving me the young, unsophisticated type. No one expected this to happen."

Dear Friends—
I feel it is an honor to take over Bonita Granville's column. I have always read it and think she has done a swell job.

Now that it is my turn I am very excited over the opportunity, and sincerely hope that I may be able to help you with your problems in these confused war times.

Keep the letters coming—and since I am married to Ronnie and have a youngster of my own, perhaps I may from my own experience be able to advise others.

YOUR PROBLEM AND MINE

By Jane Wyman

Dear Jane:

I have been very popular, and this summer went with four boys in the Service. They all loved me, and when they were home on leaves we had wonderful times, separately I mean. However, my problem is that in the last two months I have not heard from any of them, and I wonder what is wrong. Not that I really care, but it burns me up that I haven't heard from any of them.

What do you think is wrong?

Sincerely yours,
Claire S.

Dear Claire:

In answer to your letter, I don't think it has occurred to you that the boys in question may be some place where they cannot write.

Perhaps, too, they realize the feeling you have for them might be called fickle, and they are probably cataloging you as a friend.

If you would stop to think, which I don't think you have done up to now, you will understand what I mean. I think you have love confused with infatuation.

I would advise that you give more thought to the feelings of these boys who are fighting for your country, and less to yourself.

Sincerely,
Jane Wyman

Dear Miss Wyman:

The fellows in our gang have a problem and we thought you might be able to give us some advice.

We live in a small town and there is no place for us to meet and have some fun—you know, dance and sing and bring our girls—but no drinking or anything like that. We want what's known as Good Clean Fun but there doesn't seem to be anyone who wants to help us get started on such a deal.

Could you please help us with suggestions?

Johnny L. and Tom S.

Dear Johnny and Tom:

First of all, may I congratulate you upon your courage and attitude in recognizing your problem, and then trying to do something about it.

I think it would be fine for your gang to form a club of your own, and meet at regular intervals.

Why don't you try to convince your parents to let you take turns meeting at each other's homes, and with the help of a few records and cokes you could really have a super evening. If you have any sports in your community such as bowling, ping-pong, etc., you could all turn out for such an event one of the evenings after meeting, and hold regular contests.

I would feel it a privilege to be made an honorary member of such a club.

Hoping you are able to carry out this project and wishing you all good luck,

Yours,
Jane Wyman

Dear Miss Wyman:

I am very worried about my husband, and would like you to help me if you think you can.

You see, we have been married three years, and have a small baby. We are both twenty-one, and during the last six months my husband had been going out nights without me because I have to mind the baby, and now I find that he goes with other girls.

Please tell me what you think I ought to do in this case, as I am very worried. Nagging does not do any good, and I feel that the only thing to do is to leave him.

Please help me.

Sincerely yours,
Theresa M.

Dear Theresa:

In any problem as serious as you feel yours is, the main person to consider is not yourself or your husband. It is your child. If there is any possibility at all, I feel you should try to save your home.

You might try to analyze yourself impersonally, and look for the reasons that your husband's interest seems to stray toward other girls. Perhaps, since your baby's arrival, you have neglected yourself and smartness in appearance.

You mention the word "nagging" in your letter. That characteristic alone has caused many broken homes and errant husbands. It is true that the added responsibility of a child makes us all more preoccupied at times, but you should never be guilty of the old wifely art of nagging.

Yours,
Jane Wyman

Dear Jane:

I have been going steady with Jim for two years, and for the last fourteen months he has been overseas. I write him regularly and all that, but here is my problem: Do you think it is all right for me to go out with other fellows now and then, like some of my girl friends, who are also engaged?

I will appreciate any advice you can give me.

Yours truly,
Dorothy L.

Dear Dorothy:

Have you written to Jim about this, and asked his permission to go out with other fellows?. I realize it is not much fun for you to sit around all the time and not go out—but did you ever stop to consider that it is not much fun for Jim wherever he is?

Think of him and his problems rather than your own, and then write him frankly and sincerely and discuss the matter. He will always think more of you if you treat him fairly, you know.

Yours,
Jane Wyman

Dear Miss Wyman:

Although I am over twenty now, I have only been in love once, and that was when I was fifteen and the boy was sixteen. He married someone else, and has lived in another state until recently.

Last month he moved back in our town with his wife and child, and now he tells me that I have always been his real love.

What do you think I should do about this, because I can't forget him, and still love him very much.

Sincerely yours,
Martha S.

Dear Martha:

If you are actually still deeply in love with him, you will only think of his happiness, and remember that he has married and has a family of his own. You can prove your love by being big enough to stand by and refrain from breaking up his home.

If he is really unhappy with his wife, it is up to him, not up to you, to make any decisions regarding the two of you.

Try and interest yourself with new activities and new friends—keep busy and concentrate your thoughts on new subjects. This is always a good solution.

Yours,
Jane Wyman

NONE BUT FITZGERALD

Fifty years an actor, "the people's choice" for the 1944 supporting player award. Who? But of course, Barry Fitzgerald!

YOU'VE probably seen "Going My Way," and "I Love a Soldier." You may also have caught "None But the Lonely Heart." And you know as well as I that Mr. F. is no ordinary actor.

He also is no ordinary man. And yet he is: Completely. Paradoxical, isn't it?

It's hard to write about Fitzgerald. Viewed against the background of Hollywood, he is unique; yet, viewed against the rest of the world, he is not. It was by a puckish whim of fate that he achieved his present position—and he admits it—and thus he is much as any man of his type would be, if suddenly precipitated into prominence. At the same time, just to confuse the issue thoroughly, there is something in Barry himself which is distinctly his own, which makes him different from the other thousands superficially like him, which creates a personality individually remarkable.

All that, I realize, undoubtedly baffled you completely. And small wonder! But to interpolate—

From the numerous biographies which have appeared, you probably know that he comes from Ireland; that he was a power in the Abbey Players of Dublin, that he worked for many years as a clerk in the Labor Exchange of the Irish Board of Trade. (Continued on page 74)

The two brothers at Newark Airport, N. J.

WHAT a pity that Bobbie Burns, the Scotch poet who regretted we couldn't "see ourselves as others see us," didn't know about the movies. If he were living now, Ira Gershwin and his wife, Lee, could tell the writing laddie a thing or two about that. For they have just had the rare opportunity of glimpsing themselves in the Warner Brothers "Rhapsody in Blue."

When Producer Jesse Lasky announced that Robert Alda would portray George in the film, Morris Carnovsky, Pop; Rosemary De Camp, Mama; Julia Bishop, Lee, and Herbert Rudley, Ira; they breathed a sigh of relief. Everything would be okay.

It was. And now the Gershwins are happy.

But take Ira's word for it, even though the picture had been in the discussion stage since 1939, when the moment actually arrived for him to walk on to the set and meet Herbert Rudley, his alter ego, he felt a little squeamish.

"It was like meeting myself for the first time," he relates, "and discovering mannerisms I'd never suspected. As to appearance—well, he's exactly what I wish I'd looked like. However," he adds with a smile, "when I was his age I had hair, too."

Rudley is a newcomer to the screen. He first caught Hollywood's interest when he played the Paul Lukas role in the road company of "Watch on the Rhine." He's a fine, sensitive young actor (Continued on page 65)

Cornel Wilde.

A MAN TO REMEMBER

SIX FEET tall, serious brown eyes, dark curly hair, speaks six languages, and he's a champion fencer. Students! Why, it's got to be Cornel Wilde.

Who else but the new leading man who rings the bell with his magnificent portrayal of Chopin in "A Song to Remember" could qualify for such a description?

You may think "A Song to Remember" is exciting when you see it, but Cornel Wilde's own life reads like a movie scenario, too. Among his childhood memories are: Street battles in Hungary (during that country's revolution), travel all over Europe, fencing matches and championships; and as he grew up, dozens of odd jobs, theatrical successes (but more often, theatrical flops), Hollywood, and at long last—success!

"I worked for that part in 'A Song to Remember'," says Cornel. "And I worked after I got it. I read every book about the composer I could find in the library and gave hours of study to my lines. I wanted Chopin to live. No amount of study or work is too much, if you can make the character you're playing do that.

"I scarcely knew how to play the piano, but since many shots were to be taken of me actually pounding the ivories, I had to roll up my sleeves and practice."

And Cornel DOES mean practice. Under the supervision of a concert pianist, the young actor spent no less (Continued on page 78)

Imagine being able to say "I love you, dear" in six languages! Cornel can, and his romance with Pat (now Mrs. Wilde) reads like a movie story.

He likes to travel—hopes to do a lot of it—but hates unpacking!

◄ An actor, he's also a writer of plays; has two scripts submitted on Broadway.

Shaving is a nuisance? Not for him! Cornel always does something else at the same time.

He owes it all to Chopin! Plus a lot of hard work, preparing for Hollywood

MEET "Butch" Jenkins, that wistful, barefoot boy with the cheeks of tan. Just a smidge over four feet high, he's seven years old and brown as a cocoanut from head to toe. He lives with his mom, Doris Dudley, and big brother, Skipper, in a gay little beach house so near the ocean that waves sometimes lap their very doorsteps. (Much to this young man's delight!)

His best pal is Heidi, a two-hundred-pound St. Bernard who's just now outgrowing her disgrace of last summer—a clipping, French poodle style.

Roaming the beach with Heidi, or donning beach trunks for a swim in the surf is his favorite fun, but Heaven is navigating his surf board "out to where the fishin's good." There he can day-dream about pirates, until he gets a nibble.

His idea of a gourmet's delight—hamburgers and candy.

He hates liver, spinach, and shoes.

A current passion—the rhumba, and the whine of an ancient victrola.

A natural mimic and quick to follow directions; he's to do "Our Vines Have Tender Grapes" with Margaret O'Brien.

PEGGY GOES ON ALONE

Ryan without O'Connor? It's hard to imagine! Peggy herself couldn't get used to the idea, at first. But it has to be . . . and here's what she says about it

By DORA ALBERT

WHEN Peggy Ryan finished her last scene in "Bowery To Broadway" with Donald O'Connor, she sat down and bawled on his shoulder. Because she knew that wasn't just the last scene in a picture; it was period, end, finish to a wonderful time in her life. And believe it or not, even that hep kid himself, Donald O'Connor, had traces of tears on his cheeks—his own tears, not just Peggy's.

Donald was going into the Army. The two kids weren't bawling about that. That was strictly man stuff. Donald wasn't just a jive-happy youngster any more. He was eighteen.

But the team of O'Connor and Ryan had been so solid. They were like corned beef and cabbage, steak and potatoes, ham and eggs. Lots of people belonging to movie teams would secretly like to tear each other's eyes out. But O'Connor and (Continued on page 84)

PHILLIP TERRY... Success Story

Currently featured in RKO Radio's "Pan-Americana," Phil Terry can be counted as another of the many actors kept waiting for the right break, and then getting it at last. With "Music in Manhattan," his stock started to soar.

"Success is a point of view," he says. Some want money, others seek fame, but his one aim is happiness—which he has

No career competition here! Phil doesn't deny wanting to make his mark on the screen, but home comes first. Joan feels the same way, so there's no problem.

A man of many hobbies, and one is solving jig-saw puzzles.

He also likes to read, and (below) to build model trains.

ALL of a sudden, after ten years in Hollywood, banners are flying for Phillip Terry. On the strength of "Music in Manhattan," producers vie with each other for the young man's services, fat roles on stage and screen are offered him, and fan mail piles high.

Phil takes it calmly; he's had rave reviews before, and nothing happened. This time things are really popping: he has a seven-year contract for two pictures a year at RKO Studios, beginning with "Pan Americana," a coveted role in Paramount's "Lost Weekend," and the right to pick and choose from other offers.

"Success is all in the point of view," he commented, coaxing his bow tie into place before his dressing room mirror. "If you are happy, you're successful, since the goal of all men is happiness.

"Every man must make up his mind what he wants out of life. I have what I want now—happiness, true happiness, with my wife and family. Joan and I intend to hold onto what we have. You see, I'm old-fashioned. I was a bachelor until my marriage to Joan, and I meant it when I vowed: 'Till Death do us part.' If it comes to a choice between my career and Joan, I'll take Joan."

This could be a grim tale of (Continued on page 89)

FIVE BEST PICTURES OF THE MONTH

A. J. CRONIN is one of the few novelists of our time who can portray "men of the cloth" as human beings, without displeasing the Church; Gregory Peck is probably one of the few actors who could play Father Chisholm in "Keys of the Kingdom," and give to the role the interpretation Cronin must have intended.

It's apparent here that there was an important message to be expressed, and that Peck, as the kindly and understanding Scotch priest, has expressed it.

Briefly, it's the story, told on the screen as a flashback recollection of the past, of the boy Francis (Roddy McDowall) whose life was a series of tragedies—of losing his mother and father (they were drowned before his eyes); of little Nora (Peggy Ann Garner), who befriended him in the bitterest days of his childhood; of Nora, who became his sweetheart (Jane Ball) when he was a youth at Holywell College, and chose death rather than to live, wanting his love, knowing she'd never have but a part of it. Then more trials, more disappointments to be borne, more trouble and heartaches, when he was a priest assigned to a mission in China; opposition from the nuns, chiefly Maria Veronica, the Superior (Rosa Stradner); disheartening blows at all he meant to accomplish there.

Presented less pursuasively, the story might be no more than a religious sermon. As it is, it's a preachment acceptable to all.

MEET ME IN ST. LOUIS

(M-G-M)

"MEET Me In St. Louis" is the title of this Technicolorful animated family album—strictly speaking, it's meeting the Smiths. A likeable, middle-class American family such as you might have known, had you been living in St. Louis long about 1903. Father (Leon Ames), who's a hard working lawyer, head of the household; Mother (Mary Astor), who knows all so well how to manage the family "lord and master," even when he's aware of being managed; and their son, who's the eldest of the five sometimes bewildering offspring (Henry H. Daniels, Jr.); and their four daughters, Esther (Judy Garland), Rose (Lucille Bremer), Agnes (Joan Carroll), and Tootie (Margaret O'Brien).

Very much a part of the Smith family, too, are Grandpa (Harry Davenport) and Katie (Marjorie Main), the maid.

Rose, a senior in high school, and Esther, a year younger, are on the verge of being "grown-up," and that means romance (Bob Sully and Tom Drake being their respective best beaus). Little Tootie, adored by all but frequently presenting problems not romantic, claims all due attention as the family "youngest"—and being Margaret O'Brien, that's not only as expected, but inevitable!

Margaret sings in this picture, and does the cake-walk, and surpasses even herself—you may have thought she couldn't be better, more adorable, than in "Lost Angel," but she is.

"THIRTY Seconds Over Tokyo" bids to be ranked with "All Quiet On the Western Front," until now conceded to be the best war picture of all time. And having made that comparison, let us point out that both, while dramas about war, are essentially the most powerfully convincing "pleas for peace" we've ever had. "All Quiet," by the conscious intent of the author, Eric Remarque; "Thirty Seconds," by being a war documentary with none of the punches pulled—by being the story of the raid directed and led by Lieutenant Colonel (now Lieutenant General) Jimmy Doolittle, written by Lieutenant (now Major) Ted Lawson who participated in the raid, in collaboration with Robert Considine, and adapted for the screen by Dalton Trumbo.

At long last, it's the bold, sure, daring-to-reveal Trumbo writing again as he wrote when he authored "Johnny Got a Gun." Fact is, it's what that if-read-never-to-be-forgotten novel of horror might have been, had any producer dared to put it on celluloid.

For vivid reporting, for poignant, overpowering realism that hits below the belt and leaves this critic wondering how many screen audiences will be able to take it, "Thirty Seconds" (with Spencer Tracy as Doolittle, Van Johnson as Lawson, newcomer Phyllis Thaxter as Lawson's wife, Robert Walker as the G.I. gunner) will be hard to beat.

THIRTY SECONDS OVER TOKYO

THE WOMAN IN THE WINDOW

(RKO)

IN fulfilling the current demand for escapist fare, movies are taking a distinct turn to murder less wholesale than war, and the result is the psychological crime drama.

"The Woman in the Window" probably best illustrates that what's good in mysteries produced with an A-picture budget—except, that it's not really a mystery! (You know who-dun-it, all the time.) The suspense comes from watching the involved principals try to get out of the snare they are in, and instead, getting more deeply involved with every move.

Edward G. Robinson plays the home-loving college professor who, after his wife takes the children out of town on a vacation, gets mixed up in a nasty murder. He's the Mr. Average Man who proves that "Yes, it might happen to you." Joan Bennett is the girl in the case, Raymond Massey is Robinson's best friend and, as it turns out, the district attorney who sets out to unravel the crime.

The one thing a mystery must do is to hold together; that is the one criticism to be made here—that it does not. Up until the very end, yes; then all is sacrificed for the sake of a trick ending. The question is: does the surprise justify sacrificing a plot so carefully, so painstakingly and convincingly built? As it happens, we think it does; experts who're for having everything true to form, may not agree.

Be that as it may, it's an American Main Street version of "Crime and Punishment"—and it's good.

WHEN comes the time for a reckoning, to determine who of all those contributing time, money and ideas has given most for telling us what this war is all about—what it means to the boys fighting overseas, to their loved ones at home, and to those who will inherit the success or failure of the attempt being made now to forge a lasting peace—no name will stand higher on the record than Darryl F. Zanuck.

It was Zanuck who produced "Wilson," reviewing the past as a guide to the future; it was Zanuck who saw in "Winged Victory," the Army Air Force show staged with an all AAF cast, yet another cause to be served via the motion picture medium.

The result is Moss Hart's play, made into a movie about six boys from different parts of America—Alan, Pinky and Frankie (Sgt. Mark Daniels, Cpl. Don Taylor and Pvt. Lon McCallister), from the small home town of Mapleton; Irving Miller (Sgt. Edmond O'Brien), late of Brooklyn; Bobby Grills (Cpl. Barry Nelson), a shy farm boy from Oregon; and Dave Anderson (Sgt. Rune Hultman), from Texas.

The qualms about their selection, the trials of pre-cadet testing and qualifying, the primary training experiences, the thrill of graduation—we see it all. Including the pangs of farewell, when they're assigned to South Pacific duty and must say final goodbyes to their wives and girlfriends (Jeanne Crain, Jane Ball, Jo-Carroll Dennison, and Judy Holliday).

WINGED VICTORY

THE MOST ENVIED PROFESSION

at the box-office. (Remember the scene.)

Claudette, with one of the prettiest pairs of pins in cinema captivity, is also responsible for another innovation. Playing the can-can expert, "Zaza," she discovered that due to a thin thigh, she just plain—couldn't keep her extra-long stockings up—and sent for Willys. As an immediate solution, he taught her to twist a half-dollar in the stocking-top and turn it under, a trick originated by male Shakespearian actors who didn't quite fit their cotton doublets (and an idea worthy of adoption in these current days of rubberless girdles and garters). For the final scenes of the picture, Willys was ready with an elastic-banded stocking.

The first knee-length stocking was designed for Deanna Durbin's bicycle-riding scene in "Mad About Music," and proved practical for both sports and business wear. Lastex was blended with silk when Ginger Rogers fought over a pair of stockings in "Stage Door" and needed a pair that wouldn't tear. The all-elastic mesh hose worn by Alice Faye in "Rose of Washington Square" soon turned into standard equipment for dancers and cabaret entertainers all over the land.

Not all his picture creations have been of benefit to the public—except perhaps, to turn the ladies' eyes an interesting shade of green. There was, for instance, the fabulous hose whipped up for Alice Faye to wear in "Old Chicago." Of sheer black chiffon reaching almost to the hips, they had rhinestone butterflies fluttering from top to bottom and going slow around the curves. Definitely proving a few exclamation points about Miss Faye, they remain to this day the most widely-pictured pair of stockings in the world. They never became a fad, we might add, because the cost was a cool $2,500.

One of Willys' hosiery numbers actually received more fan mail than the wearer. This was a chantilly lace pair, made at the comparatively reasonable cost of $150, and worn by "Legs" Dietrich in "Flame of New Orleans." When Marlene extended one of them outside a stage-coach door in the picture, some 8,000 letters came in asking for a picture of that leg-minus-body shot alone.

Other numbers admired but never acquired, by off-screen hosiery wearers, include the $135 hand-appliqued pair worn by Barbara Stanwyck as the un-cover girl in "Queen of Burlesque." Rita Hayworth lived up to the title of "You Never Looked Lovelier," wearing a $75 pair of stockings made from georgette crepe and lace which fashioned her dancing dress.

Hollywood's top leg-man is often confronted with a request that, if he weren't associated with the picture-making business, he wouldn't believe when he heard it. One of these was an order to make a dress-up pair of hose for RKO's bovine beauty, Elsie the Cow. Imagining what he would like if he were a cow, no doubt, he made them of a shade of calf-skin flattering to her complexion, and adorned with tassels which upon close inspection proved to be little rhinestone milk-bottles. (Grade A. of course.)

Another odd request was for a pair of stockings suitable to Carole Landis' antediluvian amours in "One Million B. C." After thorough research on the subject of what the cave belles of the B. C. (Before Chiffon) era were wearing, he decided on straw. He actually rolled a pair out of this inconvenient material, but Carole complained they were scratchy. After lying awake a whole night pondering, he got up early one morning and hied himself out to a Culver City corn field. Thread spun from corn silk was not only softer but gave everybody on the set a lot of fun pointing out resemblances between the "corn" in Carole's stockings, and in the contents of the anthropological drama.

For a scene in "Good Girls Go To Paris," a pair of "comedy" hose was made for Joan Blondell with a zipper from top to toe, and came off with one motion.

The males, also, have been "special request" customers. Melvyn Douglas, masquerading as a lady in a picture, needed hose to fit an un-dainty size 13½; and Jack Benny, as "Charlie's Aunt," required size 12.

Charted in the Stocking King's office are the ankle, knee, thigh, and full-length measurements of some 350 glamour gals, and he can also recite most of those measurements by heart. The things he knows about the imperfections of some of those highly-publicized "perfect legs" would surprise you!

A one-time star of the screen ran into real trouble when skirts grew shorter and stocking-displays longer, revealing that her legs were not as patrician as her face. Nature had already bowed them slightly and the camera gleefully enlarged on this bad beginning. After due study, Willys found that a good solid seam, worn toward the inside of the leg, broke the outward curve. He wove all her stockings thereafter, with an off-center seam. This same principal reversed, seam toward the outside of the leg, long helped prevent another actress' privately-owned "knock knees" from becoming public.

Let others stick to their own convictions, says Willys, but by actual measurement, the "Most Perfect Legs" title is shared between two of Columbia's contenders, Ann Miller and Leslie Brooks. Oddly enough, because the overall statistics on Ann and Leslie are nothing alike, their stocking proportions are identical except for the length of the limb due to a difference in height. The smallest foot ever fitted for the screen, he says belongs to Lily Pons, who wears a 7½ stocking; and next in petite tootsies is Janet Gaynor, with size 8. The legendary proportions of Garbo's feet, he points out, are greatly exaggerated due to her habit of wearing flat-heeled shoes, and a private practice of going barefoot when she can. The largest stocking size in Hollywood is not Garbo's 9½, he says, but the size 11 worn by Anita Louise.

Dorothy Lamour, at the beginning of her jungle-picture career, was over-sensitive about her bare feet. Because of this, and also because California's famous weather is really capable of becoming very cool for making outdoor pictures, she required hose of a shade to resemble her skin as nearly as possible. Once, on location, she sprouted some bad runs in the last pair specially woven for that picture, and a call was put in for Willys. He arrived only to find that none of the hose he had in stock matched the Technicolor tan adorning the rest of Lamour.

Not being a fellow to hold up an entire production, he commandeered a strong pot of tea being brewed for personal consumption by a prop man, and painted over the runs in the hose until they didn't show.

Because of war-time priorities, Willys is currently more chased than a casting director, more yearned over than Grant or Gable, and sometimes downright harried. Silk and nylon priorities in small amounts are allowed for the screen, since entertainment is essential. Actresses who once bought their hose for personal wear, several dozen at a time, find it hard to get used to the fact that they must now remove their nylons and return them to the wardrobe department to be washed and worn by another glamour gal. Some of them are inclined to blame the entire situation on Willys, personally!

A lady dear to any stocking-wearer's heart is Marlene Dietrich. Currently going all-out for fighting-front entertainment, she was, in pre-war days, probably the most profligate hosiery-buyer to be found anywhere. She bought only the sheerest and most expensive hose for her personal wardrobe, had them made up as many as sixty dozen pairs at a time, and usually wore them only once.

In the era of plenty, Willys maintained a unique "Service on the Run," which meant that any of his glamourous customers getting a snag or run while night-clubbing or otherwise disporting could, through the cooperation of Western Union, have a pair of their special hose delivered anywhere, at any time.

Marlene was also the greatest patron of this service, and it never failed her, says the proprietor. Once, in the wee hours, he was roused from bed by a Western Union boy who had delivered an order to the Trocadero and found Marlene already gone. Although even her studio didn't know where she had gone, he shortly overtook her automobile on the ocean highway near Oxnard, California, and delivered a plentiful stock for her vacation in Santa Barbara.

In pre-war days, too, profligate budgets were allowed by the studios for stars with hosiery idiosyncracies. A Jean Arthur film had to allow for a fresh pair of hose for every day the picture was shooting. Wardrobe women, hairdressers and other studio femmes considered working on an Arthur film a treat, because Jean always gave them the once-worn stockings.

Loretta Young improved on the Arthur budget, by requesting a stocking change three times each day, complete with fresh round garters for each pair. Joan Crawford's stocking idiosyncracy is purely a personal one. She's a "hard to please" customer, personally or on the screen, and in spite of the Pure Food & Dye Act observed in manufacture, each pair must be specially sterilized before she will wear them.

Being this intimate-kind of stylist to the stars, Willys could often furnish the columnists a sizeable scoop, except for the fact that he's conscientious secret-keeper. He knew of the "surprise" Orson Welles-Rita Hayworth wedding almost as soon as did the principals, having to dampen the elation of the soon-to-be groom by explaining it was impossible to supply a dozen pair of nylons as a wedding gift, for even so lovely a bride as Rita.

All in all, being Hollywood's Stocking King adds up to very nice work—but getting it wasn't too easy, even after a successful reign on Broadway. At the time of deciding to contact the movie coast because of mutual benefits entailed, he had lost heavily in the 1929 stock market crash. His new career was begun on a working capital of $50 and stock optimistically obtained on credit from the silk mills. Discovering that picture people were easiest to contact on the lot, he took a day's work as an "extra" at MGM.

The picture was "The Secret Six," and he went through it with his pockets and make-up box stuffed with silk stockings. Sales and screen-actoring turned out highly successful. After seeing rushes of the picture, Marjorie Rambeau helped Willys get a bit part in "Beast of the City." Happened his dark appearance and solid build fit very well into the "gangster" dramas then just getting off to a whirlwind start, and what with an MGM contract and loan-outs to other studios, he was soon in danger of becoming a movie actor with a hidden impulse for stockings.

He adopted some desperate devices by which to corner studio hosiery contracts. Reading a gossip item to the effect that Universal prexy Carl Laemmle was planning a trip to Atlantic City with pal A. C. Blumenthal, he appeared at the studio reception desk with the announcement that he was Mr. Blumenthal. Shown at once to a sumptuous office, he then busied himself spreading ladies' hosiery all over the desk, while Mr. Laemmle was summoned from an important conference.

For awhile the results were anybody's guess. But admiring his nerve, the movie mogul finally introduced him, arm around shoulders, as a "personal friend" who could cupply 300 pair of stockings for "Show Boat" in better quality and for less cost than usual. Exiting from the wardrobe department, Laemmle whispered, "And you'd better do it, too!"

Equally encouraging results were won by donning a tuxedo, and dashing past the Fox studio gateman in a crowd of "wedding" extras. Ignoring the shouting gateman, who was too busy getting the credentials of the other extras to come after him, he continued his sprint into a wardrobe executive's office. After this rather harrowing beginning, he found himself well on his way to his present status.

After the war, says Willys, who should know, there will be new and wondrous improvements on the stocking-front. Several manufacturers have already perfected a method for weaving nylon and rubber into a lovely, sheer fabric which when snagged will not run, but just pull together again. Mud-splashed and rain-stretched hose will be a thing of the past because of a new water-repellent processing. Among his own patented innovations, waiting for manufacture, are ventilated toes and heels to help perspiring feet.

Fashion will swing back to lace embroidered and jewelled clocks and other whimsies. He himself will emphasize seams, having already designed inserted seams of lace and velvet, and some overcast with bright-colored stitching, all with heel and toe to match. There will be a variety of new shades, and no doubt a return to sheer and flawless black, which he picks as the "sexiest" color.

Meantime, says he, launder your rayons after each wearing; each washing makes them stronger. Never use water any more than lukewarm; avoid soap except on hard-to-remove spots; put a tablespoon of vinegar or bath-salts in a pint of rinse-water and allow your rayons to soak in the solution for a few minutes. Drying rayon as long as you can takes some of the stretchiness out, which should help to keep both your stockings and chins up. After all, male civilians are also having their troubles!

PHYLLIS THAXTER

fairly tall, extremely vivacious; her face is so sensitive that thoughts flit like shadows across it. She'd like to be both glamorous and sophisticated, but actually she's more of a human Peter Pan—a role she'd love to play, one of these days.

Her father is Sidney Thaxter, Judge of the Supreme Court of Maine. Her mother, then Phyllis Schuyler, was with the Ben Greet Players before her marriage. After the third child, Phyllis, was born, Booth Tarkington demanded Phyllis Schuyler for lead in his play, "Magnolia," and she played it in its brief New York run, then returned to Maine to bear her fourth child. So when "little Phyllis" yearned to act, she found immediate sympathy. No objection was raised to her becoming, at seventeen, an apprentice at Ogunquit Summer Theater.

An apprentice works hard but rarely has a chance at an important role. But Fate stepped in. Laurette Taylor, connected with the summer theater, had written a play and wanted it produced. As she sat in the dining room, reading over her script, Phyllis drifted in and caught her eye. "There!" cried Laurette, unaware that Fate had a thing to do with it, "is the girl I want—she can do the blind girl!"

"It was a very bad play," Phyllis recalls, "but what a wonderful experience to have Laurette Taylor interested in me! She knows so much, and I could learn from her."

After that came training in the Montreal Repertory Theater in Montreal, Canada, then the tremendous excitement of New York. Fate was off on business of her own, so for a year Phyllis did a walk-on bit in "What a Life!" on Broadway, a summer of stock in New Hampshire, in which she played leads in "Our Town" and "Shadow and Substance," and returned to New York. She lived at the Rehearsal Club and looked for work.

"You can't force things—goodness knows I tried," relates Phyllis. "I wore my shoes out making the rounds, until February. Then I thought I'd have to give up and go home. I went to Vermont for a weekend on a ski-ing trip with my brother and told him it seemed nothing would ever break for me and I was running out of money. But just as he was putting me on a train for home, I said: 'No—something's going to happen!' It's the only time I ever had such a clear feeling. I went back to New York."

Fate must have nudged her. Charva Chester, stage manager for Lynn Fontanne and Alfred Lunt, who also lived at the Rehearsal Club, saw Phyllis in the dining room and sent her in for an interview. The Lunts were casting "There Shall be No Night." Charva had thought of Phyllis as the ingenue, but she didn't look Finnish enough, so she received the role of the maid and understudy.

For eighteen months Phyllis was a proud member of the cast. Sydney Greenstreet, a prominent actor in the company, took an interest in the young actress; together they read Shakespeare and scenes from other plays, and discussed the theater back and forth and up and down. He taught her more than she could have learned in any school.

"There's that little Thaxter girl again," Fate must have said when, after a year and a half, Phyllis was laid off for a summer. Assuming the form of an agent, Fate despatched her to Rose Franken who was looking for a Claudia to go on tour.

"Miss Franken and I read the play together," says Phyllis. "She was so understanding! She'd say: 'This is how I like the line read, but is it right for you?' If it wasn't, I'd say so and we'd work it out. When I was ready, Dorothy McGuire, who was doing the play on Broadway, gave up a matinee to let John Golden see me in the part. I was nearly petrified at the thought of how important it was to me, but once out on the stage I forgot to be afraid."

She played the role for two years—six months in New York, six months in Chicago, and a year on the road. It was during the autumn of 1943 that Sam Zimbalist saw her in San Francisco. He was preparing to film "Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo," had just met Ted Lawson and his wife Ellen, and was sure at first sight that Phyllis was "right" as Ellen.

It was Fate again. But this time Phyllis didn't recognize it. She turned down the offer, believing she still had too much to learn in the theater. But when the tour took her to Los Angeles, she gave in, made a test and signed a screen contract.

For the first three weeks of her screen career, Phyllis lived at an apartment hotel on Wilshire Boulevard, alone and forlorn. She knew nobody, hated Hollywood, felt lost and unhappy. She was feeling particularly miserable the day Melvina Phillips, Hollywood artist, met her. Melvina had just happened to see "Claudia," had said to her husband: "That girl is a young Helen Hayes," and so was interested in the young screen find. Wasn't that Fate?

"How would you like to come and live at my house?" she asked, when she had learned how things were with Phyllis. "My husband is in the navy now and I have too much room."

Phyllis was entranced. She moved into the Beverly Hills home at once, loved Melvina's twelve-year-old daughter Gay like a sister, and became immediately part of the family.

"I'm from Indiana; I used to live on a farm and I'm intensely practical," said Melvina, reflectively, later. "My whole training had been designed to impress me that nothing should be wasted, a budget must be faithfully kept, and so on. Phyllis appalled me. I loved her—no one could help that, she is so generous, sweet and altogether amiable. But she has no money sense. At her home there was plenty of money; Phyllis left home at seventeen and naturally had had no responsibility for it. She has simple tastes, but the cost of anything doesn't occur to her. She sees something, never asks the price—if she likes it, she buys it.

"When she came to my house, we decided we wouldn't bother keeping track of every item of food bought; we'd just put ten dollars each into a pot, and when that was spent we'd put in more. One day I was already in the market, prepared to cash Phyllis' check, when I discovered it was signed and made out to Cash but no amount was filled in. Anyone could have raised it to a thousand dollars! Phyllis couldn't understand why I was so concerned.

"Often during the time we were together, we had no maid, so Phyllis, Gay and I would get such meals as we had at home. Phyllis knew nothing about cooking. The first thing she made was applesauce. Someone had told her to strain the apples, so she cooked them, core, peel and all, and then pushed them through a strainer. Apples were very high at the time; she had bought two pounds, but by the time she had them strained there was only a tiny dishful—most of the apple was in the garbage can.

"Next time, she decided to try scrambled eggs with chili sauce. She had no idea how to cook them, so most of the egg stuck to the pan. I was still at the stage of being horrified at waste, but I couldn't say anything because Phyllis was trying so hard. Claudia used to try so hard, too—remember? Phyllis hates to be told she's like Claudia, but in a way it's true."

Phyllis is shy and much younger than her years. Melvina used to think the naiveté was an act. No girl, she was certain, could be on the stage for four or five years, touring around on one-night stands, looking out for herself and completely on her own, and still be so naive. But it's a fact.

"People still laugh about Phyllis' ordering 'half a martini' at the big party in Florida, because everyone insisted she had to drink a toast," smiled Melvina. "But that's just like Phyllis. It wasn't an act. She plays with Gay as if they were the same age, yet Gay learns from her as she will learn from nobody else. Gay cues Phyllis when she has a script to learn, and Phyllis spends hours cue-ing Sydney Greenstreet when he has a long part. Difference in age is something she doesn't recognize—she's as much at home with one as with the other.

"If I've made her sound slightly irresponsible, I'm sorry, for that's very wide of the mark. Whenever my husband comes home from San Diego, he brings young naval officers with him, and the girls help entertain them. Last time Phyllis bought recordings of Oklahoma for Gay and the girls sang all the songs in costume, as a surprise. Whenever Phyllis could manage it, I used to take her with me to San Diego when I visited my husband. I was terribly tired one day when we reached the naval base. I hadn't slept, had risen very early to drive the hundred and thirty miles, and spent most of the time moaning that I couldn't possibly get home again.

"'Don't worry,' Phyllis said, when she overheard me, 'I'll drive the car home.' I thought Phyllis would be too flighty to keep her mind on her driving, but I was wrong. It was a strange road to her, very hard to drive at night—I had gotten lost even in broad daylight—but she drove as skillfully as if she had been born behind a wheel, so evenly that I slept soundly from the time we left the outskirts of San Diego until we pulled up at the house at 2 next morning."

The impression that the young actress was like Helen Hayes persisted with Melvina, the longer she knew her. Phyllis has that odd, subdued sparkle that belongs to Miss Hayes, which begins as a tiny glow and can blaze up to tremendous heights. It needs no gilded hearth.

"You should wear a skirt and blouse," Melvina used to tell Phyllis. "They look well on you—much, much better than a Schiaparelli model."

Phyllis listened, laughed, and went out to buy a pastel dressmaker suit of an odd peacock blue, in which she managed to look like an adorable little girl.

She never goes to beauty shops. Ever since she was thirteen she has put her lightbrown hair up every night on bobby pins. She's never had a permanent. The nearest she ever came to tinting her hair was one day in San Diego when she wet a heavy hairnet in salt water, tied it over her head and lay on the beach in the sun. Her hair took on a golden hue.

"It's a bad idea," she informed me. "Your hair gets dry and breaks off. I don't recommend it. But oh, I was so thrilled to be a blonde!"

Fate, who must have had a hand in bringing Melvina into Phyllis' life, had no intention of letting Melvina interfere too much.

"I used to say to Phyllis sternly: 'You must put so much money in the bank. You must not spend more than such-and-such. You will have to learn that you can't do this or you must do that.' And I'd worry because nothing made an impression on her," she smiled. "Now that I know Phyllis so well, I've decided that it doesn't really matter whether she ever learns about money or not. What she has is much more important. Let her lose money; it won't mean a thing to her. I'm not a sentimental person, but I feel that Phyllis has something wonderful to give. You might as well expect violin music, or a crystal spring, or the well-known lilies of the field to try to be practical. I shall let her alone from now on."

When Phyllis' mother decided to visit her, Melvina found a little pink house seven minutes from the studio for them, so that they could entertain their friends and be free to enjoy each other.

It would be very nice of Fate if she'd bring around a man for Phyllis who could cook like Alfred Lunt, say. The finest Christmas Phyllis ever spent was the one when the Lunts took the whole touring company out to their home for the holiday. There were sixty-five people, and Alfred Lunt cooked dinner.

"The most marvelous food I ever put in my mouth!" Phyllis declares. "That's a wonderful marriage. It's seldom two people are so well-matched. There's Helen Hayes and Charles MacArthur, the Lunts, Katharine Cornell and Guthrie McClintock—and who else? I wish it would happen to me!"

Phyllis has no set ideas on just how the Man In Her Life should look, but she hopes he'll like music, the theater, horseback riding, swimming, and not mind talking shop. She can't imagine giving up acting for marriage. She wants children, several of them, but doesn't see why she must lose her career if she's a mother.

"But I'm not really thinking of the future," she declares confidently. "What is mine will come to me. I'll leave it to Fate."

HURD HATFIELD

and drive an inextravagant Plymouth. You recall gratefully that, as a boy, you lived in an atmosphere of good books, art and culture. You studied acting in college and majored in drama.

You are a hearty eater, and your typical midday meal consists of salad with roquefort dressing, chicken fricassee, milk, toast and an elaborate dessert.

You played a small bit in a Columbia University drama class presentation of Shakespeare's "Cymbeline," which brought you to the attention of Tamara Daykarhanova, Chekhov's representative, and earned you a rich scholarship to the Chekhov School in England.

You are the only son of Judge William H. Hatfield, of New York, and Adele Hatfield, your mother, is a promising painter. You appear in 355 of the 359 scenes of "The Picture of Dorian Gray." You revealed something of your natural shyness when you shared your first kiss with Angela Lansbury, and the director had to clear the set until you got used to the "ordeal."

You are ever grateful that Iris Tree, daughter of the great English actor, Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree, brought you to the attention of director Albert Lewin. You have large, luminous eyes, a loathing for the two-tone Hollywood suits that men wear, with sleeves of yet another material for added effect.

Your failure in the title role of "Robin Hood" at the ripe old age of seven still rankles. You missed your cue, and were instantly relieved of your role. You agree that this undoubtedly accounts for some of the grim thoroughness with which, later, you were to prepare yourself for a career as an actor.

Your father had considerable influence in stimulating your interest in spoken drama. You once said, "When I was about eleven my father and I got into the habit of reading stories, poems and plays aloud to each other. We read virtually every known classic." You realize now what a good background that was for later drama studies.

You are very superstitious and harbor a tendency to follow the smallest hunch. You are very much at home in fuzzy tweeds and careless sports clothes. You enjoy an early morning swim in the ocean near your house, walking in the rain, and intuitive women.

You dislike restaurants with glaring lights, and one of your favorite diversions is snubbing snobs. You once wrote a play which was adapted to opera libretto, set to music and successfully presented at the Juillard School in New York.

You don't like women with snoods.

You admit to being lazy, yet you will run a mile from high-keyed people and off-key singers. You also stay away as far as possible from radio masters of ceremony who kill time with forced laughter, people whispering at symphonies and moviegoers who unravel candy wrappers in the dark.

You were born on December 7th, in New York.

You appeared with Ruth Gordon and Walter Hampden in a Broadway play, "The Strings, My Lord, Are False." You toured the country, prior to that, with the Chekhov Theatre in "Twelfth Night," in which you played your favorite stage role of Sir Andrew Ogvecheck; in "King Lear," as the Duke of Gloucester, and you also portrayed Caleb in "Cricket on the Hearth."

You attended Morristown Prep, N. Y., Horace Mann, N. Y., Riverdale Academy at Riverdale, N. Y., and Lincoln School in New York City, before ending up at Columbia University. Your thorough education fitted you to enjoy at its full your eventual tour of England, Brittany, France and Germany.

You don't like silk shirts, and your favorite actress is Greta Garbo, and your favorite actor is Michael Chekhov. You have lots of Indian friends, like the famous Shan-Kar dance troupe, and hope that one day you can go to India and appear in plays there.

You like all kinds of Russian food, such as shaslik, with Beef a la Strogonoff a close second.

You live in a quaint old adobe-walled house in Santa Monica, alive with the memories of the talented people who lived there before you: Actor Peter Lorre, Director Edmund Goulding, and Author James Hilton.

You are forever sitting at the stone table beneath the huge pepper tree where Mr. Hilton wrote part of "Goodbye, Mr. Chips," not entirely because of that sentimental reason but also because it's the only cool spot on a hot day.

You have a weakness for soft lights and music.

You nearly always eat by candlelight of an evening. You have a dislike for the sight, smell and taste of pigs' feet, and enjoy reading into the early dawn: James Cain, Thomas Wolfe and Shakespeare, among others.

You still recall as one of your favorite stage roles the part of The Baron in "Lower Depths," which you enacted at the Chekhov Theatre in New York. You are unmarried, but you still faithfully correspond with a girl friend from your early school-days in New York.

You have an unusual liking for deliberately losing contacts with people, places and things, and then regaining them later for further and added enjoyment. You love a good play, and are ever-disappointed that, in California, they are so few and far between. You like to sketch, and whenever the circus is in town you can't resist going with pencil and pad.

You never wear a hat, carry an umbrella, or sport a loud tie.

You always get a great kick out of eating in the crowded studio commissary, except on days when the scenes are unusually difficult, and then you partake of lunch on the set or in your dressing room.

You count among your best friends in Hollywood: Dancer Virginia Hunter, Actor George Sanders, and Actresses Donna Reed and Angela Lansbury.

You enjoyed playing with Katharine Hepburn in "Dragon Seed" and you were excited and flattered beyond words when she visited the set of "Dorian Gray." What you fail to reveal, though, was the marvellous and typical remark of Katie who said, "Hi, chum—I hear you're doing wonderfully—are you?"

You can't be too grateful to Director Albert Lewin who couldn't do too much to go out of his way to help you in your career in the movies.

Your favorite form of relaxation is long talks on the telephone with people who save something to talk about.

You like eating dinner by the fire, playing the piano, and were startled when you discovered that you had to play the only Chopin prelude that you hadn't learned, in "Dorian Gray": the twenty-fourth.

You acknowledge with amusement that on the stage you were a youth who always played elderly, decrepit gentlemen, but that in your current picture you portray a man who remains a youth all his life, in appearance, while only his portrait ages. You always look the same in "The Picture of Dorian Gray," although twenty-two years go by.

You had your portrait painted four times for the picture, by the celebrated twin painters Ivan Le Lorraine and Malvin Albright, and wish that you could own one. You don't care for film colony night life, and rarely go out after dark. You recently had your pants patched while waiting to meet Garbo for the first time, because the dog of your hostess, Salka Viertel, didn't know you.

You can't wait for "The Picture of Dorian Gray" to be shown so that you can find out how really worthwhile it was for you to follow the hunch that brought you to Hollywood for a vacation. You hope and pray that it was, and that people will like you in your first big role in the movies.

You do admit, though, that your hunches so far have turned out all right—and well, here's hoping, Hurd Hatfield!

THE GERSHWINS

from the New York stage, and first thought he'd become a lawyer in Philadelphia, his home town. But it didn't take him long to discover that the only part of the legal industry he really cared about was the chance to orate in court. So he decided to chuck the bar in favor of the stage.

Reading from Shakespeare for Eva Le Gallienne, he was promptly given a place in her stock company, and he went on from there. Le Gallienne said he had "more abandon" than any actor who had ever auditioned for her.

His abandon didn't do him much good in the Gershwin film, however, because as he confided to Ira, "Mostly, I just follow George through doors."

"I regretted for him," says Ira, "that we couldn't arrange a circus or something equally colorful, but since he was playing ME in the pictures, there wasn't much else he could do. After all, the picture was about George. So whether he liked it or not, Rudley was stuck with me and my personality. And he seemed to know everything about me—even the way I held a cigar."

"Why not?" Rudley grinned when Gershwin mentioned it. "I've been checking up with your friends." Curious to know just what could be unearthed by such a survey, Ira got him to explain.

"Well, for instance," explained Rudley, "there's that business of poker. When you play cards, you have a habit of pressing a poker chip against your forehead and leaving it there throughout the game."

"How'd it go?" asked Ira.

"After all that work, would you believe it—not a poker game in the picture!"

And if Ira was pleased about Rudley, Lee was enthusiastic about Julie Bishop. But the thing that really fascinated her was the studio's reproduction of the Gershwin living room, which was perfect down to the tiniest detail. The studio had even borrowed the pictures from their walls. Lee arrived while Director Irving Rapper was out to lunch, and she walked through the room. When Rapper returned, he didn't see Lee, but he did see her footprints on the highly polished floor.

"Hey, take those footprints away," he yelled to a workman, who suggested that it might be more natural if a room did have a footprint or two.

"There are no footprints in the Gershwin home," the director boomed.

In describing her impressions, Lee says: "It was like a nightmare from which there was no escape. Pleasant enough, but uncanny. Lights glared overhead and dozens of workmen milled around in what seemed to be our own home. Same furnishings, same faces, same gags. Even Oscar was there." (Oscar is Oscar Levant.)

Kidding Writer Clifford Odets, an old friend, about working on the picture, Ira asked: "What are you doing on a Gershwin picture, Cliff? I thought you were the big Beethoven man."

"This isn't just the story of George Gershwin," Cliff answered seriously. "It's your story and my story, too. It's the story of Irving Berlin and Moss Hart and every kid who grew up on the East Side."

Odets was right. It is the story of those kids from the East Side. Kids like Edward G. Robinson, for instance, who became outstandingly successful, when they might so easily have gone the other way.

"I got to thinking about those kids from the East Side," reminisces Ira. "Cliff's remark dug up memories. Memories of lots of things. But mostly of my brother, George—an eager kid who was born to music. A boy who studied all his life, who never stopped working, straining, striving for perfection. A boy who, at 22, while writing the "Scandals," was getting up early in the morning for classes in Orchestration at Columbia University. A man who had the most tireless energy I've ever seen; a restless, sensitive dynamo, always driving himself, never content with what he had written, always feeling he could have done it better."

Ira, one of the most conscientious workers in show business, and the only lyricist ever to receive the Pulitzer Prize, depreciates himself.

"With me, it was different," he tells you. "I worked hard, too, when we had a job to do. But between shows, I felt the need of rest. Often I vacationed three or four months. George could never understand that. He used to nag me about being lazy; was always after me to write a libretto. If he'd lived, he'd have forced me to do it, too. Just as he kidded me into becoming an amateur painter—saying if he could do it, so could I. But he couldn't teach, coax or heckle me into becoming as good at golf or other sports as he was, and he couldn't impart to me that incredible physical rhythm which was so much a part of him."

The "Rhapsody in Blue" holds many poignant memories for Ira Gershwin. The home at 110th Street and Amsterdam Avenue in New York, where it was written, with George working in the midst of bedlam. Writing the "Rhapsody" in a room where, not ten feet away, his father and his friends played noisy games of pinochle. Cigar smoke so thick you could hardly breathe. And George, oblivious to everything but his music, hearing and writing melodies that would one day be world-famous.

And later, in 1928, the thrill of a lifetime: hearing it performed for the first time in Paris. The brothers had been in that city only two days when it happened, and George was busy working on "An American In Paris." Rhene Baton, conducting a symphony orchestra at the Mogador Theater, included the "Rhapsody" on a program that boasted names like Cesar Franck and Bach. Because of the limited time for rehearsals, and the complexity of the piano passages, Weiner and Doucet, the orchestra's pianists, divided the solo parts.

And they were good, too. But the orchestra, which had had only one rehearsal, gave a pretty ragged performance, with some notes even bluer than George had conceived. Despite the inadequate performance, Ira had a hunch that the audience would welcome this composition because of its strange and exciting quality.

George thought otherwise. He squirmed and suffered it out as long as he could, then with: "This is terrible. I can't stand it any longer," he dashed for the nearest exit. A couple of minutes later, with waves of thunderous applause ringing in his ears, and the shouts of the audience for "Gershwin, Gershwin," Ira had literally to drag his brother in from the lobby. Not until the tenth curtain-call did George really believe that Paris had put her stamp of approval on him and his "Rhapsody in Blue."

Congratulations were in order when Lieut. Comdr. Richard Barthelmess, USNR, met son Stewart, newly commissioned in the US Navy.

Their old friend, Deems Taylor, didn't know the boys were in Paris, but he was in the audience that afternoon and wrote: "I should have figured if the Rhapsody was played, and there was a curtain-call to be taken, Gershwin would be there to take it!"

Ira will always remember their first Hollywood job, too. For it proves what producers—sometimes—think of The Arts. Ira and Du Bose Heyward had worked on "Porgy and Bess" with George, but in addition to the composing, George spent seven additional months orchestrating it—which meant that he had been working steadily for two years on one thing. He wanted a change, and suggested Hollywood.

Archie Selwyn, trying to get them a job, had a tough time.

"Gershwin? Sure it's a name—maybe even a big name," one producer admitted, "but that's high-brow stuff. The guy just wrote an opera!"

Finally, George had to send a telegram. He wired: "I am not a high brow. I have written many hits and I expect to write many more." Ira chuckles when he tells about it.

Yes, there's no doubt about it, this picture has stirred memories for Ira Gershwin. But would you really like to know his first impression when he was introduced to Herbert Rudley?

"So! Here's Ira Gershwin," he said to himself. "From now on I can take it easy. This fellow can write my lyrics." It was futile, wonderful daydreaming.

"My brother, George, used to accuse me of being lazy," he smiles. "I guess he would call that running true to form."

THE END

PICTURES IN PRODUCTION

GOD IS MY CO-PILOT, with Dennis Morgan, Raymond Massey, Andrea King, Alan Hale, Dane Clark and John Ridgely.

NOBODY LIVES FOREVER stars John Garfield, Geraldine Fitzgerald, Walter Brennan and Faye Emerson.

AT COLUMBIA:

COUNTERATTACK, with Paul Muni, Marguerite Chapman, Larry Parks, and Adeline DeWalt Reynolds. This is a story of Russian partisans behind the German lines. Sequence that covers three days in the picture, but will require about twenty-four days to film, shows Mr. Muni and Miss Chapman trapped in a subterranean cellar with a group of Nazi officers.

LET'S GO STEADY has Pat Parrish, Jackie Moran, June Preisser, and Skinnay Ennis' orchestra hanging on the garden gate.

OUR WANDERING DAUGHTERS has Cora Sue Collins, Eric Sinclair, Ralph Hoopes and John Calvert. It's all about Her Mama Done Tole Her.

I LOVE A MYSTERY is the film treatment of the celebrated radio show written by gifted Carleton E. Morse. The principals are Jim Bannon, Nina Foch, George Macready, and Barton Yarborough whose voice you will recognize instantly as he appears not only in the radio version of "I Love A Mystery," but he is Clifford in "One Man's Family."

AT MGM:

WOMEN'S ARMY, with Lana Turner, Laraine Day, Susan Peters, June Lockhart, brilliant Agnes Moorehead, Jess Barker, and Bill Johnson. You may disregard the rumor that the entire Air Force is trying to get transferred to this Metro branch of the service.

HOLD HIGH THE TORCH, being shot in Technicolor is on location at Lake Chelan, Washington. Star is Elizabeth Taylor, the able 12-year-old actress who was Velvet in "National Velvet." The story deals with a dog-of-war and its rehabilitation after it comes home from the front. Lassie is doing this part with such Thespian artistry that she is being called Greer Garson With Fur.

THE VALLEY OF DECISION is being made from the celebrated Marcia Davenport book with Greer Garson (a redhead again), Gregory Peck, Lionel Barrymore, Donald Crisp (just divorced by his writer-wife June Murfin), Marsha Hunt, Preston Foster and Dan Duryea.

WITHOUT LOVE has just started rolling with Katharine Hepburn, Spencer Tracy, Lucille Ball, Keenan Wynn (who will be a father for the second time in February), and Felix Bressart.

OUR VINES HAVE TENDER GRAPES should be one of the pictures of the year. It deals with a year in the life of a Norwegian farmer in Wisconsin. Edward G. Robinson—wearing overalls and a mustache—plays the farmer, Agnes Moorehead is his wife. Margaret O'Brien is their daughter, and Jackie Jenkins her cousin. While the company was at the Metro farm on location someone asked Margaret what she liked best about being a bucolic maiden—going barefooted, perhaps? "I go barefooted in the city," explained Margaret with her gentle smile. "What I like is catching frogs with Jackie."

WEEKEND AT THE WALDORF is Grand Hotel in New York with Ginger Rogers, Lana Turner, Walter Pidgeon, Van Johnson, Keenan Wynn, and wonderful Robert Benchley, the pin-up boy of the Helen Hokinson girls.

AT PARAMOUNT:

SALTY O'ROURKE is the current Alan Ladd picture (which means that it will be a good one because Laddie is a conscientious man who will do battle in behalf of a good script), with Gail Russell, Stanley Clements (who was the toughie in "Going My Way"), Bruce Cabot (his first picture since his many months in Africa for the Air Corps), Spring Byington and William Demarest (one of the funniest men in town). Don't miss this one.

THE GOLDEN YEARS has Sonny Tufts, Veronica Lake, Lillian Gish, Bill Edwards and Pat Phelan (for whom Paramount has great hopes). This picture was originally titled "Miss Susy Slagle's" and the story deals with the occurrences in a medical boarding house presided over by prim, proper Miss Slagle (Lillian Gish).

DUFFY'S TAVERN boasts about everyone on the Paramount lot in its cast. Notable, in addition to Ed Gardner, Marjorie Reynolds, Hope, Crosby, etc., etc., are two not-so-well-known genius-kids. One is comedian Cass Daley (now appearing on the Maxwell House show) and the other is brilliant dancer, Johnny Coy.

THE LOST WEEKEND, with Ray Milland, Jane Wyman, Philip Terry, and Doris Dowling, is nearly finished. So nearly that Mr. Milland has his first shave in weeks.

THE LOVE LETTERS is distinguished by a splendid cast: Jennifer Jones, Joseph Cotten, Ann Richards, Cecil Kellaway (the Prince of Wales in "Mrs. Parkington"), and Derek Cooper. The Paramount lot has been rocking with justified laughter because this is one of the big-budgeted pictures, yet there isn't a Paramount contract player in the cast.

AT UNIVERSAL:

THE SUSPECT stars Charles Laughton, Ella Raines, Dean Harens, and Henry Daniell. On the set Ella Raines was telling the story of the month. For her new house she ordered a seven by seven bed to be constructed; when it was delivered, it was discovered that the frame couldn't be inserted through the doorway, hence had to be returned to the manufacturer to be whittled down. Then, when the bed size was reduced, all the sheets and blankets had to be altered. "A case," intoned Mr. Laughton who knows his Shakespeare, "in which sleep could not knit up the raveled sheets so fair."

SALOME—WHERE SHE DANCED is actually the name of a town in Arizona. This story opens in Vienna in 1865 and progresses by a series of plot flights to America. Yvonne de Carlo is given her first starring role and has the distinction of being the only successful girl in pictures who is living in a $1.00 per day motor court. Can't find another place in which to camp.

FRISCO SAL is the latest venture of Susanna Foster, Turhan Bey, Alan Curtis, Andy Devine and Samuel S. Hinds. A picture printed in a fan magazine somehow gave the recent impression that Turhan and Susanna were about to be married; because of Turhan's recent and sincere interest in Lana Turner (also publicized), he has received some poison pen letters from those who are trying to protect Susanna's "romance."

SHE GETS HER MAN is a comedy with Joan Davis, Leon Errol, Bill Gargan, and beautiful newcomer Vivian Austin—of whom you will hear more in a hurry.

HERE COME THE CO-EDS . . . had better turn around and go away or Abbott and Costello will get them, aided by Martha O'Driscoll and Peggy Ryan.

AT RKO:

THE WONDER MAN is working with wonder man Danny Kaye, Virginia Mayo, Ed Gargan, Allen Jenkins, Huntz Hall (who says that being an ex-Dead End Kid has really made life tough for him—self-styled pugilists are always "choosing" him in public places), Grant Mitchell and the Polka Dot Girl, Chili Williams.

TARZAN AND THE AMAZONS, Johnny Weissmuller, Brenda Joyce, and of all people to turn up in the jungle, Madame Maria Ouspenskaya.

WEST OF THE PECOS. Bang, Bang. Bob Mitchum, Barbara Hale, handsome Ritchard Martin, and Bryant Washburn.

THE ENCHANTED COTTAGE is rolling with "Claudia"—Dorothy McGuire, Robert Young, Herbert Marshall, and Spring Byington. More detailed report on this later after your reporter visits the set.

AT REPUBLIC:

A DARING HOLIDAY, with Edward Everett Horton, Gladys George, Jack LaRue.

THE PHANTOM SPEAKS, Richard Arlen and Lynne Roberts—strictly from fright.

EARL CARROLL'S VANITIES, Dennis O'Keefe, Constance Moore, Eve Arden (one of the best comediennes on earth), and Alan Mowbray.

AT 20TH CENTURY-FOX:

HANGOVER SQUARE, distinguished by the presence of that quarter ton of talent, Laird Cregar and George Sanders, plus Linda Darnell, Reginald Gardiner, and in the opposite corner Producer Robert Bassler and Director John Brahm.

BILLY ROSE'S DIAMOND HORSESHOE is a Technicolor confection with Betty Grable, Dick Haymes, Beatrice Kay, Dorothy Day and George Melford. Did you know that technicians who have officiated when Betty dubs her songs, say that she is the best in the business?

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE is a question to be answered by Fred MacMurray (borrowed from Paramount) and Joan Leslie (borrowed from Warner Brothers) plus the home lot talent of June Haver.

ROYAL SCANDAL is the new title of erstwhile CZARINA, or THE RELUCTANT DRAGOON, with Tullulah Bankhead as the glandular monarch, and Bill Eythe singing "Reign, reign, go away—and don't come back another day." Charles Coburn, Anne Baxter, Vincent Price, and Mischa Auer are also in there discovering what are the divine rights of queens.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE is a whodunit being investigated by Michael O'Shea, Lloyd Nolan (now quite silver-haired), Trudy Marshall, and Ruth Ford.

AT UNITED ARTISTS:

HOLD AUTUMN IN YOUR HAND, described last month in detail, is still in the process of production with Zachary Scott, Betty Field, Estelle Taylor, and Percy Kilbride dealing in the palmistry. Incidentally, a chap who knew Percy Kilbride casually, saw him dining alone in a cottage-like local tearoom one recent evening, and strolled over to chat. During the course of the conversation, the visitor mentioned that it was rather lonely to dine in public without company. "I really don't mind at all," observed Mr. Kilbride with his norther-waste smile. "I just have an abandoned face."

IT'S IN THE BAG is the madness with Allen, Benny, Binnie Barnes, Robert Benchley, John Carradine, Jerry Colonna and most of the other local comic characters. A good straight man could steal the picture.

BLOOD ON THE SUN is Jimmy Cagney's latest producing venture, so you should see it for two reasons: First, Jimmie Cagney is such a sweet guy, and second, it will surely be a good picture.

"Cultivate Contrast"

A beauty without any bunk about her, Joan Bennett has a personal fountain of youth plan.

IF YOU talked about fairies or magic to Joan Bennett, particularly in connection with her own special brand of dazzle, you could expect a polite facsimile of the well-known Bronx cheer.

You think we're kidding? Well, then listen to some of Joan's quips and quotes. "I eat like a horse"—"Press agent ballyhoo is so much hog wash"—"It's plain silly for a girl to lose her figure just because she's had a few babies."

Pretty basic stuff, coming from a glamour girl. And if it sounds as though Joan doesn't give a rap about her looks or her career, you're about to be surprised again. In fact, we'd like you to take a really good gander at La Bennett in her current International Picture called "The Woman in the Window."

Can it be that Joan is a day over twenty-five? It probably can. She has three daughters. And the oldest one is seventeen!

Here's the way Joan looks at looks. Some things are basic and unchanging. For instance, with her—feminine means fastidious, and that means super-clean skin on face and form. Manicures and pedicures are strictly on schedule—once a week. Hair care is no mere brush-off. It's a circulation-stirring drama that goes on every day with the help of brush and tonic jars; every week or oftener with a billowing bottle of shampoo.

It calls for a strong constitution to make men weak. So Joan takes her sleep in eight hour doses; her vitamins as a matter of well-balanced courses.

After the glamour groundwork has been laid, our Miss Bennett goes all-out for effects. One day she looks like her daughter's younger sister. The next, she will out-Mata any Hari the studio whips up.

Joan has great belief in what she calls the "fluff." Her make-up may be simple or simply sensational. She changes her coiffure to complement the occasion. She suits her scent to the sort of girl she feels like, so sometimes a sultry perfume contributes to that wicked gleam in her innocent blue eye.

There you have it—good sense in good grooming. Great sensitivity to changing styles and situations. The result is consistent contrast: a type that will never be outmoded because it's subject to change without notice. It's a type to strive to simulate!

JACK CARSON

Mrs. Lipschitz, and I think it's fine!”

Mrs. Carson looked blank. “Er—er—thank you,” she finally stammered. Later she approached Jack. “Look, son,” she said. “Miss St. Germaine seems to be a very sweet girl, but is she—er—quite bright? Yesterday she called me Mrs. Lipschitz!”

“Oh, that!” Jack laughed. “Think nothing of it! I told her our name was Lipschitz for a rib! She must have believed me!”

Neither time, tide, nor the importance of his victim deters Jack, the Ribber, once he gets the urge to have a little clean fun at another's expense.

When Anatole Litvak was directing Jack in “Blues In The Night,” for example, the whole set was thrown into an uproar one afternoon when Carson “fainted” dead away at the conclusion of a simple scene. Litvak was in a tizzy and did a super-special job of exploding in his nervous, excitable way. “Quick!” he shouted. “Get a doctor! Get two doctors! Get an ambulance! Get the Hays Office! Get Mr. Warner!”

He was stroking the Carson head solicitously when Jack feebly opened his eyes. “What was the matter, boy?” Litvak asked. “Did you have a stroke?” Jack shook his head. “No, Mr. Litvak,” he said earnestly. “It was just that you always make at least twenty-seven takes of a scene, and when you said 'Print it!' after that first take, the shock was too much for me!”

Litvak, being a good sport, howled with everyone else.

Alexis Smith never will forget another day, on the “Mark Twain” set. Jack had been a frequent visitor and was enchanted by a perfect little table model of the river boat used in the picture. One day he led Alexis to look at it.

“Don't tell anyone, because I want it to be a surprise,” he said, “but I've rigged this thing up with a cute trick. I've got it fixed so that when you pull this little cord, which is supposed to blow the boat's steam whistle, a real steam whistle blows across the stage. Look, I'll show you.”

Gently he pulled on the cord, and sure enough, across the stage a steam whistle sounded. Alexis was delighted with the gadget. Later that afternoon she was playing hostess to some visiting naval dignitaries, and took them to inspect the little model. Across the stage Jack watched eagerly, a gleam in his eye.

“But here is a real surprise,” she told them. “Admiral, just pull this little cord and see what happens.” Dutifully the admiral pulled the cord as instructed. He was surprised alright, but not half as much as an embarrassed Alexis, when the entire stage suddenly was filled with a resounding Bronx cheer!

Jane Wyman still burns when she remembers the day during the filming of “Make Your Own Bed,” Jack's first starrer, when she said, “Oh, kiss my foot!” to Jack after he had provoked her patience beyond endurance. Obediently Jack knelt before Jane in front of a flock of visiting strangers, removed her shoe and stocking, and insisted on kissing her foot, toe. by toe! Turning to the goggle-eyed strangers, he smiled sheepishly. “Silly, but we have to do it every day to keep her happy,” he explained. “Temperament, you know.”

For some unknown and never explained reason, two sacks of fertilizer stood in the corner of the old dressing room Bob Cummings used during the three years he was at Universal. Eventually Bob got so used to their presence that he completely forgot about them. On the day he moved over to Warners to make “Princess O'Rourke,” however, two fresh sacks of fertilizer were delivered to his new dressing room.

“Compliments of the management,” Jack wrote on the accompanying card. “We want you to smell at home.”

It is within “the family,” experience has proved, that the Carson ribs reach their finer heights. “The family” consists of Carson, his wife, Ann Sheridan, Jane Wyman and Dennis Morgan, who have formed themselves into a unit to bring entertainment to servicemen in outlying camps and posts. Usually the troupe is scarcely on its way when busy little Jack gets to work and the others groan, “Here we go again!”

Just before show time recently, Ann Sheridan was scolding Jack for introducing her on their previous appearance as “The Oomph Girl.” That tag, always odious to her, finally had been forgotten by the public, Ann reminded him, and she intended it should stay forgotten.

“But how do you want me to introduce you?” Jack asked. “What do you want me to call you?”

“I don't care what you call me, so long as you leave that Oomph Girl stuff out!” Ann bridled. “I mean it!”

Later, as she stood in the wings of the theater awaiting her introduction, Ann again cautioned Jack by gesture. “Remember, no Oomph Girl.” Jack nodded his understanding, and stepped forward.

“And now, fellows, I want to present a little lady who has spent practically her whole life in the theater,” he began. “You have seen her and loved her many times in many pictures, just as Hollywood loves her for her sweet and gentle ways. It is with great pride and humility that I give you . . .”

Faces in the soldier audience fell a mile. Obviously the original Mother Machree was on deck, and they wanted sex and glamour.

“. . . that Grand Old Lady of the Screen, Miss Ann Sheridan!”

On that same trip Dennis Morgan also came a cropper, courtesy of Ribber Carson. The two were discussing what songs Dennis would sing, and Dennis suggested “The Desert Song” from the musical of the same name. “Oh, no, not again!” Jack groaned. The song is one of Dennis' favorites, and Jack claims that Morgan sings it at the drop of a hat.

“Well, alright then,” Dennis said grudgingly. “I'll let the fellows call for request numbers, but I know they'll ask for 'Desert Song.' They always do. They like it.”

A few minutes before the show was due to start Jack was giving the audience a warm-up talk. Dennis had ducked out for a quick cup of coffee. “Look, fellows, I want you to help me pull a rib on Morgan,” he confided. “When he asks what songs you want him to sing, whatever you do, DON'T ask for 'Desert Song.' Ask for anything but that, and watch the fun.”

Joan Blondell and Reggie Gardiner at the party given for "Mom" Lehr's Guild Canteen.

The soldiers agreed, and later when Dennis asked for requests they shouted “Besame Mucho,” “All or Nothing At All,” “Irish Eyes Are Smiling” and dozens of others. Each time Dennis smiled graciously, said he would sing the number, but what else did they want? Playing along with the gag to a man, no one mentioned “Desert Song,” to Morgan's utter astonishment and somewhat hurt feelings. Could Carson have been right? He wondered. Were people sick of hearing him sing it? Gosh, and it was his best number!

Finally he happened to turn and see Jack behind him, doubled up with laughter. The light dawned.

“I get it!” he told the soldiers. “Well, by criminy, you're going to get 'Desert Song,' like it or lump it!”

They got it and liked it.

Once in awhile the victimized worms turn. In Seattle, Wash., recently Jack lay down on his hotel bed in the afternoon to take a nap, dog-tired from a radio show and a dozen personal appearances at war bond rallies. He woke up in the darkened room to find a strange blonde, clad in a filmy negligee, sitting on his bed, shaking him gently, and saying “Wake up, darling, wake up!”

Horrified, Jack sat up. “Hey, get out of here!” he shouted. “You've got the wrong room!” The girl denied it. “Then you've got the wrong person!” he stormed. The girl attempted to put her arms around him. “Darling, don't be silly,” she said. “What a way for you to talk to little me.”

Cold sweat broke out on Jack's face as he jumped from the bed. “Look,” he said. “I'm from Hollywood. My name is Jack Carson. I don't know what kind of a racket this is, but you're not going to pull it on me. Now get out before I call the manager!”

At that moment the closet door was opened to reveal Jane, Dennis, Ann and his wife laughing hysterically. The “stranger,” of course, had been hired by them to play the part.

“Bravo!” they applauded a crimson-faced Jack. “For that scene you ought to rate an Academy Award!”

Gathering the shreds of his tattered dignity, Jack stomped out of the room. “Nuts to you guys!” he muttered.

The records show, however, that it was a good two weeks before Jack, the Ribber, was back in form.

THE END

JUNE ALLYSON

home. Then she doesn't see him again, until she returns those novels for another batch.

"I'm going to compile a book," June announces suddenly. "You see, I mark all my books—the passages I like for mood, for dialogue, for just plain narrative value. Some day I'm going to put all the passages together and make my own book. I think it's a great idea, don't you?

"I sketch, too. I just love to sketch. I did a charcoal of a friend of mine, on his boat, and he was just crazy about it. So one day I sketched a girl who was polishing brass on another boat nearby. I left the sketch sort of hanging around where my friend would be sure to fall over it. He did, too. He looked at it frontways, upside-down, and then sort of sideways. 'I'm not sure I know what it is,' he said, 'but it's awful.' I haven't sketched since."

Her favorite dress-down clothes are blue jeans, boots, shirt, jacket, and big dirty gloves. Decked out in this non-fashionable fashion, she loves to tinker with boats. Anybody's boat. She especially likes to brood about the time she was fixing her car when it stalled near the studio. She came up grease, ran off to find a mechanic, and bumped into her dream boy, Fred Astaire, instead. She's never gotten over the let-down of meeting him in "black-face." She'd always dreamed of being dressed like a professional mannequin in a dazzling outfit for that meeting. Now she's working up to another ensemble for the moment when she first meets Ginger Rogers. She wants to knock her eye out—figuratively speaking, of course.

The fact that people really like to hear her sing frankly puzzles June. "Why me?" she asks. "I don't really know from singing. I just throw back my head and howl. I sing in the shower every day. It does wonders for other people. But for me, even 'Deep River' changes keys in the middle of a bar. It's awfully discouraging."

It isn't superstition that gives her her coffee quirk. We'll be darned if we know what to call it. Maybe some good psychiatrist has a name for it. But she'll order coffee, pour cream into it, inhale its fragrance as though it were French perfume, and then drink exactly one-quarter. Then she orders a fresh cup. A refill won't do. It has to be a fresh cup. To nip this complex in the kitchen, so to speak, June's pals at the studio gifted her with a dainty blue-and-white demitasse cup. But she forgets to tote it with her, with the result that waiters at local bistros are beginning to treat her like a two-headed zombie.

Bess, the major domo, rules June's roost with an iron hand. And June loves it. Bess has taught her how to buy clothes with an eye to making one item do several jobs. When June sneaks a new purchase into the house, it's Bess who ferrets it out, gives it the glassy eye, returns it pronto. But June's catching on, now. She takes Bess shopping with her, and saves herself a lot of wear and tear.

"Bess does all the cooking," June says, "except when I sneak into the kitchen. I love to putter. I'm no mechanical cook. Electric gadgets throw me into a tizzy. I've got one recipe that's surefire, though. It's called 'Egg Thing.'

"You put a piece of spam in a pan. Then you put two whole eggs on top of that. Then you add a professional secret, which I won't give you because this is an exclusive recipe. It comes out with the eggs whole and a big puffy thing on top, and I pour stewed tomatoes over it all."

Those marriage rumors that have been cropping up like mushrooms after a spring rain have given June a lot of laughs. Maybe it's a superstition, but she habitually wears some item from her current picture throughout the entire production, and that means after work, too. With "Music For Millions," it was a wedding ring. And when June stepped out on dates flaunting the gold band, even the Sphinx had to open up and crack about it.

Her views on her future marriage to some future guy are pretty sound. "I'm too young," she says, "to think about it seriously—yet. I'm not ready for it. I think marriage is a real, full-time job—one you have to work at with your whole heart and soul, your time and energy. When I do marry, it'll be to a man who loves boats as I do. And then I'll give up my picture career and devote myself to my maps, my navigation, my Spanish, and—incidentally, to him."

But, until she meets that guy and sets that date, June Allyson will be sticking around Hollywood putting that personality, like a hypo, into the arm of every picture they hand her.

And we hope she keeps that young frog in her throat. As we said before, on her it sounds good.

FAREWELL MY LOVELY (RKO-Radio) stars Dick Powell, as the private detective unraveling a murder case —which should be enough to tell you that here's a picture with "something different" to offer, and it does!

Not only does it make a dramatic actor out of the melody man kept too long in roles that were sweet and singing; also, it poses the question: just how complex and involved can a screen plot be, without defeating its own purpose?

There's a slightly loco and more than slightly dangerous gangster; a missing hunk of jade, a quack psychiatrist, a secluded beach house, a beautiful-but-hard blonde, a brutal beating, a mysterious girl. Scramble that all together, add a lot of rapid-fire dialogue, and whatever your criticism of this mystery thriller, it won't be that "it's too obvious." Fact is, there's more than an outside chance that you'll leave the theater with the plot still rattling around in your head, like a pebble in a concrete mixer.

Speaking strictly on the production side, though, there's credit due for a lot of tricky camera effects. So here's tossing bouquets to Adrian Scott, producer; Edward Dmytryk, director; Harry Wild, director of photography; and Vernon Walker, special effects man.

FACES IN THE FOG (Republic) Another story of child delinquency through lack of proper parent interest.

The parents (Paul Kelly and Lee Patrick) are too busy with their own pleasures to pay much attention to their children. When faced with a problem—their son (Bob Stebbins) gets into a minor brush with the law—they quickly jump to the other extreme and become domineering, thus precipitating a more serious offense by their daughter (Jane Withers).

When Jane's father, in a moment of rage and misunderstanding, shoots her newly wed husband (Eric Sinclair), she humiliates and perjures herself in court to protect him. It is not until Jane is forced to take the consequences of her perjury that her parents realize how thoughtless and unjust they have been.

SOMETHING FOR THE BOYS (20th Century-Fox) is the Broadway musical comedy of the same name, added to and elaborated upon but still pretty much the same hilarious "songs with a series of incidents."

It all takes place (or most of it) in the mildewed manse at first misrepresented to its three inheritors as a Georgia plantation manor. Setting to with the quite honorable motive of doing "something for the boys," the surprised heirs get the idea of turning the old place into a hostelry for visiting war wives. Take it from there, and you get nowhere fast—what with all the romance complications, the war maneuvers, and madcap confusion of the issues at hand.

Probably it's not logical, having as many things happen as happen here, but it's all done in the spirit of good fun—and good musical numbers—with Carmen Miranda, Michael O'Shea, Vivian Blaine, Phil Silvers and Perry Como to keep the plot boiling furiously, and melodiously.

THE VERY THOUGHT OF YOU (Warner Bros.) A sleeper or a charmer, this one—all depending upon the point of view, and your requirements for what makes a good movie.

Basically, it is the romance of a soldier and his girl—the soldier, Dennis Morgan; and the girl, the new, the lovely Eleanor Parker. And as with all stories about soldiers, Morgan has a sidekick (Dane Clark), and he also has a girl, the engaging Faye Emerson.

Given a couple of G.I.'s returning to the States after two years in the Aleutians, the theme is more situation than plot. Boy meets girl—on a bus. Follows marriage, then separation when Morgan again goes overseas, then final reunion. The want of anything unusual in the story is overcome by its being so simple, so commonplace that it takes on the charm of the familiar, and of being all so delightfully "real."

of the first correspondents to reach Honolulu afterward. He was also with the assault troops on the Normandy beachhead. Aside from being a rugged guy and a terrific reporter, he is one of the nicest men on earth. Deanna deserves someone as super as Bob, and Bob deserves a honey like Deanna.

Whatever you do, don't miss seeing 20th Century-Fox' cinema version of the Army Air Show, "Winged Victory." Hank Daniels, the lead, is terrific. So is Lon McCallister as one of Hank's best friends. So is Edmund O'Brien as the comedy character from Brooklyn. So is George Reeves as the flight instructor. So is Richard Travis as the minister. It's a great show—the sort of entertainment you have a right to expect from the studio that made "Wilson." And if you haven't seen "Wilson" RUN, do not walk, to your nearest theatre, or you'll be sorrreee.

PATER PAIR:

Everyone in Hollywood more or less takes it for granted that Van Johnson is an integrated uncle in the Keenan Wynn family, and Keenan's young son has grown accustomed to taking up his problems as much with Van as with his own Daddy.

One day recently the family was sitting around the pool at the Beverly Wilshire Hotel, Mr. Wynn clinging to the arm of his daddy on one side and Van on the other. A pretty little miss passed the group and looked envious. "Look at that little boy," she piped. "He has two fathers."

Mr. Wynn will also have a new brother or sister in February.

PICK-UP:

She was pretty; she was gay in the manner of a girl in love. She wore a bright, becoming hat and a mink coat. "Waiting for a pick-up?" someone asked her as she loitered in front of Lucey's on Melrose Avenue.

"You're right," she grinned. "A soldier."

A few seconds later, Major William Howard drove up and motioned his wife, the screen's Miss Dorothy Lamour, into his car. This romance is one to which Hollywood may point with pleasure, because it is working out so very, very well.

POP ON ICE:

Although his repertoire of anecdotes is an extensive one, Pat O'Brien, like most successful raconteurs, has a habit of trying out a few reliable laugh-getters when he finds himself in a new group.

Recently, the O'Briens were entertaining some out-of-town guests. Pat, in mellow mood, tried one of his old standbys, which went over big. Sean, Pat's young son, apparently enjoyed the yarn as thoroughly as the rest of the group, but as the laughter died down, he cried enthusiastically, "Now, tell the OTHER one, Pop!"

OLD SHELL GAME:

When piquant June Preisser and her husband, Dick Terry, moved into their new hillside home in Sherman Oaks, they were approached by a detective agency which supplies watchman service for a good many homes in the district. However, June and Dick said laughingly that their small home with its modest furnishings would certainly offer no temptation to burglars. "In case you should change your mind and decide at any time, day or night, that you need us, just call this number," said the representative, leaving his card.

Several weeks later, June was alone one night. She had just finished reading the evening paper with its murders scattered over the front page, when she heard a muffled step upon the front porch. She froze in her chair, her ears extended from their sockets in long thin scoops to catch the sound. Sure enough, there was another step, guarded, careful.

June managed to coax her feet into carrying her to the telephone, and whispered an S.O.S. to the patrol agency. A big, burly man was there in no time, listening to June's story. "Didn't see anyone dart into the bushes or run down the road as I drove up," he assured June.

But at that moment, she heard the restrained, thumping tread again. "Get him," breathed June as they flung open the front door in time to hear two more quick steps on the porch.

The patrolman turned to chuckle down at June. "Never lived in the country before, did you?" he wanted to know. The "footsteps" had been made by the falling of walnuts from the huge tree at the corner of the house.

"MERRY MONAHANS" IN MANHATTAN:

Peggy Ryan went to New York for the first time to appear personally at the opening of "The Merry Monahans" and her stories about Gotham experiences are worthy of note. She used eight lipsticks, giving lip-prints to a new type of autograph seeker; she cut five locks of hair; she was mobbed while entering her hotel one night, and the heel was torn from her shoe. Instantly, several of her over-eager fans offered shoe coupons, which—of course—she refused with thanks. Somehow the word spread that her heel had been broken, and when she reached her suite, the hotel had rushed a doctor up to treat her. The doctor was not amused. Peggy had the time of her life, laughed heartiest at being called the Sinatra With Blood.

NICE GIRL

affairs is currently being rectified. But the most surprising part of the whole business, to Eleanor, is that such a thing should have happened to her in the first place. Because although she looks like an angel—and now acts like one—the last part is the result of a turn-about reaction from her early teens.

Eleanor started out as anything but a nice little girl. "I was the nastiest kid in our neighborhood in Cleveland," she'll tell you shamelessly. "I made life miserable for all my friends. They'd come over to play with me, and I'd send them home because I didn't want to share my paper dolls with them. I was selfish, and I hurt feelings right and left.

"I made life miserable for my older sister and brother, too. Let them just mention that some friends were dropping in for the evening, and I'd immediately decide to do my homework in the living room. No one could budge me.

"All in all, I was a terrible child. When I wasn't climbing trees or playing baseball in the streets, I was cooking up trouble for my friends. I was the little girl who was always daring them to do something awful, but always very careful to stay out of trouble myself."

Only once did her friends turn the tables on Eleanor. When she was ten, her friends dared her to smoke a cigarette behind the garage. For once they caught her off guard, and she agreed.

"I couldn't wait to tell Mother. I always told her everything. And anyway, I was really proud of smoking. I found her busy in the kitchen. 'Mother,' I said proudly, 'I just smoked a cigarette.'

"Mother's mind was on other things and she didn't pay real attention to what I was saying. She just smiled and said 'Well, don't do it again, dear.'

"I was relieved that Mother wasn't angry with me. By dinner time the smoking incident had assumed dramatic proportions in my mind. I was a heroine, a fearless young pioneer. At the table I looked grandly around at the family, determined that none of them should be left in ignorance of my great feat. 'When I smoked the cigarette', I began—

"I got no further. There was a united gasp, and then a lot of shocked exclamations. 'What did you say?' Mother asked weakly. 'But I told you all about it this afternoon', I explained. 'I didn't hear you', Mother said firmly. And then retribution caught up with me."

Eleanor went on this way, until she was thirteen . . . then came love!

Eleanor had a "secret" crush on a boy in her class that manifested itself in giggles whenever she saw him. Till one day he said: "Boys don't like silly girls."

"I went home and cried," Eleanor tells us. "I withdrew into a shell. I did a complete and involuntary switch, much to my family's relief. Dad, who was a high school mathematics teacher, began to hold his head up again. I waxed quiet and shy. I thought everything over before I said or did it—I was so afraid of being thought 'silly'."

At fifteen, she was one of the most popular girls in high school, shy though she was. Virtue's reward was Ed, best athlete in the whole school, for a boy friend.

"By this time," Eleanor comments now, "I had learned my 'little lady' lesson very well. Life was very pleasant."

This little idyll lasted until Eleanor went away with her family for a two months' summer vacation. By the time she returned, she found Ed less thrilling.

"But it wasn't long until I found a new boy friend," she laughs. "This time it was Bob, a friend of Ed's, and also an outstanding athlete. We went together for three years, until I left to come to the Coast and enrolled at the Pasadena Community Playhouse."

It was at the Playhouse that Eleanor was "discovered." Life was very rosy.

"Oh, and by then I was such a nice, quiet little thing," she laments, "that no one would give me a chance to play anything else on the screen. That school girl reaction of mine wasn't really helping my career. Hollywood might have been kinder, had I been a sophisticate."

She had just about made up her mind to do something about it, when she met Fred Losee on the "Mission to Moscow" set. Fred is a dentist, serving as a senior grade Lieutenant in the Navy, stationed until recently in the South Pacific.

He was a visitor on the set; a mutual friend introduced them. Fred looked so handsome in his uniform that Eleanor perversely decided he must be conceited. She was extraordinarily abrupt with him; didn't like the guy and didn't try to hide the fact.

But the next day he was back, with proofs of some pictures that had been taken on the set the day before. He asked her to help him select the best ones. Eleanor did, and this time accepted his invitation to lunch. Then she dined with him. Then she went home and informed her roommate: "You wait and see! He doesn't know me very well yet, but that's the man I love, and that's the man I'm going to marry."

That was in November. Two weeks later, Fred went East. He didn't return until the end of February. And in March, 1943, meek and mild Parker became Mrs. Fred Losee.

It was a whirlwind romance, followed by a brief honeymoon. Fred went overseas the following June and they didn't see one another for more than a year.

"But I heard from him two or three times a week," Eleanor says, "and I wrote him nearly every day."

Ironically enough, like most couples separated by the war, they thought and wrote most about the time when they'd be together again. Yet when that time came—having contracted filariasis in his right hand, Fred was sent back from the South Pacific and assigned to a Navy hospital—it didn't take long for them to decide, by mutual agreement, that their marriage was a mistake.

Eleanor was sharing an apartment with two other girls, when Fred came back, and she was hard at work on her most important screen assignment—"Of Human Bondage." The couple managed only brief week-ends together. And as soon as the picture was finished, Eleanor was rushed off to a hospital for an appendectomy. (Fact is, she's had trouble finishing the last days of shooting; had been working in ice packs, so to speak.)

It's hard to say how all these complications fit together to explain a marriage that didn't last. Perhaps we can just put it down as "another war marriage, with Fate against it at the start."

And now, back to Eleanor's problem of proving she could be a nice girl yet act like something different on the screen. Now that she's playing Mildred in "Bondage"—a role which is the ultimate in screen badness—she feels she's been completely vindicated on that nice girl score.

"No one can look at me after this," Eleanor declares happily, "and decide I'd be just perfect as the ingenue in the next picture they're casting!"

Which is perfectly all right with Eleanor, whose tastes in roles have always run in the "character" direction.

But if witches are her favorite roles—and they are—in real life she's more frightened than frightening. She's always scared stiff, she admits, at the start of a picture—and especially so, when making tests.

When she tested for "The Very Thought of You," Ida Lupino was scheduled for the lead, Eleanor for her girlfriend. She hates to think what would have happened if she'd been testing for the lead.

As it was, she couldn't sleep or eat for three days before the test. And when it finally started, she was so sick with nervousness that she nearly fainted. They had to use smelling salts, and walk her up and down for fifteen minutes, before she could even begin. Of course, as always happens with her, the moment she actually got underway she was fine.

After trying out for the smaller part, Ida Lupino was taken ill. Without another test—"thank heavens," Eleanor's still saying—she went into the leading role.

She hopes that some day she'll be able to overcome this weakness about tests. It worries her.

"There's something so 'silly' about being scared to death," she concludes in a discouraged voice.

THE END

BARRY FITZGERALD

Besides that, you know that he's not married, that he's in his fifties, that he came over here eight years ago, and that he's just knocked the socks off the part of the old priest in "Going My Way." There are also the little details that he lives with his stand-in, loves to play golf, and is now becoming an American citizen.

Those are the bare facts. But what's he like?

I'd wondered that, too. So one day I went up to his house—motive, to meet the man and see what he's like!

I parked my car on a hill lined with palm trees and riotous gardens, noticed that there was a slightly beat-up tan Chrysler convertible at the curb in front of me, and climbed some stone steps to the wide porch of a dwelling which Hollywood would call old and out of date. It was covered with vines, painted white, and looked comfortable. That made it no dwelling for a movie star.

I rang the bell, and found myself shaking hands with a small man dressed in gray plaid slacks, a harmonizing blue shirt, and gray suede moccasins. He had a pipe in his hand. (I learned later that his friends wonder whether or not it has taken root there!) He brought me into a living room furnished with man-sized, chintz-covered chairs and couches, a piano, and a row of books over the fireplace. He offered me a cigarette, and while I was lighting it I began to get my first good look at the man.

Here again, confusion must reign. For Barry Fitzgerald looks like Father Fitzgibbon—and yet he doesn't. He looks like fey, little Mr. Twite in "None But the Lonely Heart"—and yet he's different. You can't explain it. It's just a statement of fact.

You might call his face nondescript if you didn't see his eyes and watch

ADVICE FOR ABUSED SKIN

DON'T BE AFRAID AND STOP WORRYING NOW ABOUT EXTERNAL SKIN TROUBLES. FOLLOW THESE EASY DIRECTIONS. YOU CAN NOW ENJOY A PORCELAIN-LIKE SOFTER SKIN

HAVE you ever stopped to realize that the leading screen stars that you admire, as well as the beautiful models who have lovely soft white skin, were all born just like you with a lovely smooth skin?

Almost everyone can have a natural, healthy, normal complexion which is in itself, beauty, and which gains admiration and is pleasing to look at. All you must do, is to follow the simple rules of nature. Models and screen stars must give their skin special attention. So should you because everyone looks at your face. Your social success may depend upon your being good looking and pleasant to look at. A lovely skin may be a short cut to success in love and business. Your pleasure is worth it, and you owe it to yourself to give yourself a chance to enjoy a healthy, beautiful complexion. Medical science gives us the truth about a lovely skin. There are small specks of dust all around us most of the time. When these little specks, which are in the air, get into an open pore in your skin they can in time, cause the pore to become larger and more susceptible to dust and infection. These open pores, begin to form blackheads which become infected and bring you all of the misery of pimples, irritations, or blemishes. When you neglect your skin and abuse it by not giving it the necessary external care it requires, you leave yourself wide open for external skin miseries which cause embarrassment, self consciousness, inferiority, and make you feel like a prisoner within yourself. When you know that your skin is smooth, white, and fine, you have more confidence and it helps improve your personality and your entire well being. A flawless skin is priceless, yet it only costs you a few pennies daily to keep it normal, natural, more healthy and lovely. Many never realize or even suspect that the difference between having a glamorous complexion and being ordinary is just the difference between having blackheads and pimples, and not having them. A little care and the proper attention with the double Viderm treatment can mean the difference between enjoying fine skin or missing out on many pleasures because of an ugly, abused skin. The double Viderm treatment is made under the supervision of a doctor and costs you only a few cents for a treatment which you can give yourself.

Just write or mail the coupon below, and you will receive two jars of the double Viderm treatment with full directions which are written by a doctor. One jar contains a jelly-like formula which is a highly concentrated soap which penetrates and acts as an antiseptic upon the pores. This is used after you wash your face in the usual way. After you use the special Viderm skin cleanser, you apply the Viderm fortified, medicated skin cream. You rub this in, leaving an almost invisible protective covering for the surface of your skin. This double treatment has worked wonders for so many cases of abused skin and it must amaze you, too, or it won't cost you a penny. You must be absolutely pleased and delighted within ten days, or your money will be cheerfully refunded. It is a guaranteed treatment. Enjoy it. Send for it now.

Use your double Viderm treatment every day, until your skin is as smooth and clear as you may want it. Then, use it only once a week to remove stale make-up and dust specks that infect your pores and to aid in healing external irritations. When you prevent blackheads, you prevent externally caused skin miseries and pimples.

his smile. His eyes are blue, clear, honest and thoughtful. There is intelligence in them, and humor, and great tolerance. There is also shyness. And it's this quality—a sort of wistful timidity—which holds you, which causes you to realize that he is something new, and that anything he says, because it will more or less be dragged out of him, will be worth listening to and remembering. You want to please him, desperately. You want him to like you, though he'd think you were insane if you mentioned it. You want to make him laugh and watch his slow smile light up his face. And, above all, you want the benefit of his calm, wise outlook on life.

We talked of many things, of books and people and nations and ideas. We talked of what had happened to him in the last year.

"My career is sort of—unexpected," he said, deprecatingly, as he lit his pipe. "I was interested in the theatre in Ireland, just as many people are. I've been acting a long time . since 1916, in fact. But I didn't expect in the beginning to become an actor to the exclusion of everything else. For fourteen years or more, I worked for the government in the daytime and only acted at night.

"To become prominent is a great strain," he continued. "In some ways, it is a disadvantage. People stare

"One gets used to it, I suppose. But I like to go into a new town with my hands in my pockets and my pipe in my mouth, and wander around, just looking. I can't now."

It was somehow sad that he couldn't. Then he brightened.

"The next picture I'm in," he said smiling, "will probably be a great flop and it will be all over. I won't have to worry about it!"

I asked him if he had enjoyed playing Father Fitzgibbon.

"I liked it enormously," he answered. "You see, I sort of understand that sort of man. I've known many old priests like him in Ireland—one in particular, who had a parish near where I used to live. And though I'm not a Catholic, I have great sympathy for the Church and its people. I was glad to be able to present a new idea of the priest, an idea which I believe is actually much closer to the majority of them than the popular conception. You know, most of us think of a man of the cloth either as being a jolly good fellow who doesn't think very much, or a man who is so consecrated that neither he nor anyone else gets any fun out of life. Neither is true. But Father Fitzgibbon and Father O'Malley were. They were the young and the old, honest characters and worthy of respect.

"I had a funny thing happen to me, apropos of that," he went on, his hands busy with the pipe again. "I was on a train a little while ago and there was a young priest across the aisle from me. A soldier came up to him and said, 'Father, I've just seen GOING MY WAY. All you priests must have an interesting life!'"

Fitzgerald has not enough praise for Bing Crosby.

"It was remarkable, working with him," he told me. "He'd look at his lines and somehow absorb them instead of learning them. Then he'd say them as they should have been said: naturally He has a great gift, that man People say that he's just himself He is. But that's a special thing. It's no accident. It involves a keen sense of timing, an ear for sounds, relaxation and common sense. The sum of these is a person whose acting talents have been vastly underestimated."

I asked him if he had ever played golf with Bing.

"Oh, no!" he replied, surprised, seemingly almost shocked at such a subject. "He's a good golfer. I seem to get worse as I get older."

I wanted to know what else besides the mashie and the niblick he liked when not working.

"I ride a motorcycle," he answered, surprisingly. "And I talk a great deal too much. I read a lot—biographies mostly. I try to play the piano a little. I drive my car—that Chrysler out in front (the beat-up one! I remembered). And I go to the beach."

His friends?

"They're people nobody knows. Not Hollywood. And there's my brother, Arthur Shields We're very congenial. How did I get the name 'Fitzgerald?' Well, I was working in the Board of Trade and I thought they might object to my acting. When they made up the program for the first play I was in, I told them just to put down any name instead of my real one. They picked 'Fitzgerald,' and it's stuck to me ever since!"

How did he happen to come to America?

"The Abbey people made three tours here in the '30's," he told me, "and I loved the country. At first, I had the usual idea of the United States—gangsters, and all that. I knew practically nothing about it, geographically, except that New York was in the East and San Francisco and Los Angeles were in the West, and that there was a place called The South. But, on those tours, we went to little towns—college towns, for instance—and I got to know the people and to like them. Then, after I'd returned to Ireland, John Ford sent for me to do 'The Plow and the Stars.' I was delighted to come back."

Does he like pictures?

"It exhausts me to make a movie," he said. "Everyone is tense and yet bored, you see. You're always waiting for a scene, so you can't relax, really. And at the same time, there are long periods when you just sit—and sit—while men set up lights and things. You don't have the fillip of being on a stage, either: of feeling an audience. Consequently, I don't want to do much in the future. Most actors want every part that comes along. I don't.

"Strictly speaking, I suppose I'm really an office clerk," he added, smiling again. "Quite often, I don't feel a bit like an actor."

He didn't sound like one. Praise be. He sounded like a man who remembered that there were other things in life besides cameras and publicity. That was refreshing.

I asked what sort of parts he wanted.

"No particular type," he said, "except that I do enjoy characters who are slightly philosophic." Then deprecating again. "They're very easy if you get the right lines!"

He's slightly philosophic himself In fact, he's more than "slightly."

Versailles, or maybe just to two disappointed G.I.s who'd traveled all day in a jeep to catch her, and had just missed the show.

"You didn't miss anything," Dinah would grin, climbing back on the truck again. "What do you want to hear?"

She smiles now when she remembers the surprise of a bunch of weary engineers on their way back to the front lines, in that forest near Verdun, when they'd looked up suddenly to see Bing Crosby and Dinah walking toward them singing "It Ain't Necessarily So."

To men like those, demobilization is still a mighty empty word. But "to come home" is what they all want, figures in most of what they think about. General Bradley wants it, General Patton wants it, every G.I. wants it.

They do a lot of planning about what they want to do after the war. Many of them want to come back to their same old jobs, some never want to see theirs again.

A truck driver named "Cliff," from Louisiana, who'd driven a truck all his life through the bayou country, and then driven for two years in the army, never wants to see the inside of a cab again.

A G.I. named "Mac" dreams of getting back home to Colorado and raising white-faced cattle.

Lots of the boys want to come back to the same places where they worked before, but to advance themselves in their jobs. Take the kid named "Berke," from Brooklyn, for instance. He'd been brought back wounded from the Front for the third time; had just heard, through the army grapevine, that he had a new baby at home. (Those things really get around in the army. He hadn't even heard from his wife yet; didn't know whether it's a boy or a girl.) And he was crazy to get back to the States and see it. Having been wounded three times, he was really due for a rest—but he wouldn't take it. Baby or no, he didn't want to come home until it's all over and his buddies can come, too.

Back in Brooklyn, Berke had worked in a pharmacy. He wants to come back to it again, but he wants to study pharmacy, when he comes home, and go back as a pharmacist instead of a soda clerk.

Frank is from Jersey. He's seen a lot of action. An awful lot. And when it's all over, he just wants to grab his wife but quick and move way out in the country where it's peaceful; where he can start a farm, and watch the cows come home.

Some of them want to come back and do crazy things. Like the technician named Carmen, who was attached to the same unit. Before ye olde draft papers, Carmen had been the best jitterbug dancer in all Jersey, Brooklyn, and well . . . all. He won every prize they put out.

"Youse know what I want to do?" he'd say to Dinah, nearly breaking her up with a familiar lingo that sounded so funny in a pasture in France. Funny and good and American.

Carmen had fallen in love with an English girl, and when the war's over he's going to bring her back home with him and go into the dice manufacturing business. That sounded pretty funny, too. With the deep boom-boom-boom of the 155's knocking out German positions ahead, and there was Carmen . . . sitting there calmly talking about manufacturing dice! How he's going to save all the money he can, when the business gets started, and send his savings back to Italy to help Uncle Sam feed his relatives. "I can't ask Uncle Sam to feed ALL of 'em," he said. "There're too many!"

Carmen may have gone A.W.O.L. from the American matrimonial fold, but the Carmens are few and far between over there. Most of the boys have built their girls at home into Angels, and worry like crazy when they don't hear from them for awhile.

Dinah's advice to all those girls—to you, and you, and you—is: "Write your fingers off! Spoil 'em to death. Yes, and start stocking up on the brightest, prettiest clothes you can find. Feminine, frothy stuff. Loud colors—reds, yellows, fuchsia. And crazy little hats with bows and feathers."

Dinah will never forget coming upon a weary, muddy G.I. one day, as he was resting against the side of his tank and staring at a clipping somebody had torn out of a magazine. It was an advertisement of some frilly pom-poms and cocked bows that they called hats. "Cute, funny little things, aren't they?" he said, staring hungrily at the picture, as if he could eat two of the little hats, with mustard, all by himself.

"They may laugh at them but they love 'em . . . and oh, how glad they'll be to see 'em again!"

The boys went simply wild over Dinah's white shoes. Silly little white doeskin pumps, with open heels and very little for toes. They have the place of honor now in the big glassed-in shoe case in her dressing room. When she brings them out carefully for you to see, you just see some white sling pumps, sickly white now from being cleaned too many times, with a patch of mud caked on the bottom from a pasture in Verdun, and two bad scruffs on the sides from knocking against the side of the truck, when she was jolting down the blacked-out roads.

"These white shoes just killed 'em," Dinah drawls now. "Honest, if I'd never sung a note, and just stood up there with these shoes on, I'd have been a success."

"Jeez, white shoes! Can you imagine?" the boys would say when she got up on the back of the truck to sing.

She used to take them off to rest her feet while she sang, and usually had to go looking for them when she got through. Some G.I. would be standing way in the back, just holding them and looking at them. On one occasion, a kid from Georgia was about to make off with one of them.

"Say, what are you tryin' to do?" Dinah kidded him. "Want to have me hobbling around these pastures singin' on one foot? Make me do it the hard way, huh!"

"I was going to send it back to you, Dinah. Honest I was," he said, grinning sheepishly. He'd just wanted to keep it for awhile.

Bing's ties sort of killed 'em, too. They thought they were just about the handsomest things they'd ever seen.

Whenever the boys spotted them they'd really let out a whoop. "Hey, Bing . . . just lemme feel it!" "Oh boy! I could use a DOZEN of 'em right now," they'd laugh.

So let there be dozens of them, gals. And let there be light, too, when he comes home. Light up every room in the house, like a Christmas tree. You'll never know what a thrill those sixty-watters can be, after feeling and groping his way across continents in blackouts the past two years.

Oh yes . . . and let there be sheets. Cool, crispy white bed sheets. Oh, how he'll love to hit the sack on them. Sheets are what Dinah herself missed most over there. She didn't have a sleeping bag for some time, until she finally "scrounged" around and found one. Until then, she washed her face towel out in a helmet in the daytime to use for a "pillow" . . . and hoped it would be dry by the time they bivouacked at night.

Dinah usually traveled strictly with enlisted men, but she did meet General Omar Bradley on the trip, and had lunch with General George S. Patton, with whose outfit she'd been traveling informally for some three weeks. And she can tell you that both generals would like an ice cream soda, too!

When Dinah reached Verdun, a bunch of the boys insisted on entertaining her at dinner, in the basement of an old hotel there. They ate by candlelight and really put on the dog—a combination of K-rations, pate-de-fois-gras, and champagne.

They spent all evening toasting good old American chow and everything they wanted, when they got back to the U. S. A. Dinah, who doesn't drink, raised her glass to clink with theirs.

"Vive la Hamburger!" one would say.

"Avec relish!" added another.

"Vive la French fried potatoes!" said somebody. "Sans dehydration," he added as an afterthought.

But the show-stopper was the toast of the G.I. who raised his glass solemnly and said, "Vive L'America." Then pulled a snapshot from his pocket and added, "And vive Marge."

They all raised their glasses and drank to his wife Marge. But they were really drinking to you . . . and you . . . and you. To the time when they'll be seeing you.

CORNEL WILDE

than four hundred hours, within four months, at the piano. He played on the set, off the set, in his dressing room, at home, at friends' homes, everywhere. At the end of the four-hundred-hour period, he was nursing numbed finger tips and aching joints—but, he had succeeded.

And we said he speaks six languages? Well, here's what we mean—and you can count 'em for yourself.

Although he was born in this country (on Friday the 13th of all days), he spoke Hungarian and German first. Not until he was several years old did he learn to speak English. You see, Cornel's father was a native of Hungary but spent most of his time in New York, carrying on an importing-exporting business. Then in 1916, during the first World War, the family boarded a liner for Europe. Once inside the Hungarian border, Papa Wilde sent his family off to Budapest, and he reported for duty as a captain in the cavalry.

It was then that young Cornel began babbling away in Hungarian and German. It was also then that he witnessed the shooting in Budapest.

"My mother and sister and I were walking peacefully down the street one day," Cornel recalls, "when suddenly we heard shots being fired. It was the Hungarian Revolution. My sister was in tears and my mother petrified. As I was only four years old at the time, I simply stood and gaped.

Late in 1920, the Wilde family returned to the United States, and Cornel took up the life of an average American boy—yes, and learned to speak English. It was an average life, that is, up to about the age of ten, when he began to dream of becoming a Sir Launcelot and waving a mighty sword. He started training for fencing and, in years to follow, won several national championships. In high school, he learned two more languages—French and Italian. Russian is his current assignment.

At sixteen, he entered Columbia University, tried out for football but got banged up in his first practice scrimmage. (In fact, he so seriously injured his back that he was later turned down by the Army.)

In 1931, Cornel toured Europe again with his family and spent six months in Budapest, studying art and fencing. When he returned to New York, an old illness of his father's thrust Cornel into the role of "family provider" and made it necessary that he find a job. This, as you may remember, was the middle of the depression. Jobs were not a matter of choice but of what you could get. Cornel got an odd and assorted series. He sold dolls in Macy's basement, did art work for an advertising agency, solicited ads for a French newspaper, acted as a counsellor for a boys' club, sold billboards, real estate, refrigerators and waterless cookers, and was a night cashier in a drug store.

"Two years of that was sufficient," Cornel recalls. "I went back to Columbia to embark on a pre-med course. I studied like the devil, finished the three-year course in two years and was awarded a scholarship to the Physicians and Surgeons College. However, a chance to act in summer stock suddenly appeared on the horizon. I'd always harbored a secret ambition to try the theatre, so . . ."

The stock company he joined folded like a house of cards after one week, but Cornel had smelled grease paint. And that was enough! The dramatic teacher, Theodora Irvine, noticing that Cornel had talent but no money, offered to coach him on a pay-me-later basis. This meant back to the strange assortment of jobs in the daytime and studying acting at night. But at long last, his break came. He was chosen to play the romantic lead in what was to be a Broadway success, "Moon Over Mulberry Street."

But that still wasn't the top. Cornel played stock a couple of summers, had the misfortune to be cast in a row of unsuccessful Broadway plays, translated dramas from German and Hungarian for eating money, and in the midst of all this, got married. But more about that, later.

Oddly enough, it was Cornel's fencing ability that saved the day. Because of it (he was so good he was selected to be on the 1936 Olympic Team, but turned it down in favor of stage work) he won the role of Tybalt in "Romeo and Juliet."

Vivian Leigh and Laurence Olivier were the stars of the play, and they were doing their rehearsing in Hollywood. So Cornel went West. After the play's run in New York, Warner Brothers remembered the handsome young actor who'd been in Hollywood a few months before, and signed him to a six-month contract. But as so often happens to unknown actors and actresses, a first contract, even at a major studio, isn't an open sesame to success.

After a few walk-on parts, he was dropped. Came some bitter times, but finally 20th Century-Fox signed him to a contract. It was this contract, which is now shared by Columbia, that finally led to his being borrowed by the latter studio to play the part of Chopin in "A Song To Remember."

We said we were going to tell you about that marriage. Well, that, too, reads like a Hollywood script. It was one of those rare instances of love at first sight. Cornel was coming out of Columbia's New York offices, several years ago, when he spotted the most beautiful blonde he'd ever seen. He knew she was the one for him, but he wasn't quite sure how to go about convincing her he was the one for her—so, he just followed her down the street at a discreet distance. When she entered a drug store for a coke, he made like he was using the telephone, but while he was going through this piece of business, the future Mrs. Wilde finished her coke and walked out. Luck, however, was with him; for two weeks later he met his lovely blonde again. This time he spoke, but he got the cold shoulder, so to speak. When he met her for a third time, the girl whose name was Patricia Knight could resist no longer.

Cornel was going to arrange for Pat, who was in show business too, to make a screen test with him at one of the major studios, but just about the time arrangements were completed, there was a reorganization and neither Cornel nor Pat got the test. Ten months later, Cornel DID get the girl though, and they eloped to Maryland.

On Washington's birthday, 1943, a baby girl was born to the couple and named Wendy. "That was the most memorable day of my life," states Cornel. "I paced the floor of the waiting room for what seemed years! I felt awful, and so afraid for Pat."

Wendy seems well worth all the trouble and anxiety she caused her parents. Actually, though, she's but one of two junior members of the Wilde family, the other being a giant-sized French poodle named Punch. Punch and Wendy get along famously. They took to each other from the very start and spend most of their time in the yard digging up Daddy Cornel's victory garden.

Cornel rents a small house in Beverly Hills, but he'd like to build a home of his own some day. The present menage, by the way, houses a painting of a modern Romeo and Juliet, painted in oils by Mr. Wilde, himself. He's now working on a portrait of his wife, and expects later to do one of Wendy and Punch.

An artist at heart, Cornel has an eye for color in more things than painting. He likes different combinations of colors in his own clothes—gray suits and dark red ties, or dark suits and black knit ties—but best of all he likes to wear a white suit, white shirt and a striped tie.

However, in private life the young actor cares little about clothes. His favorite costume around the house is a pair of shorts, or old slacks and a sport shirt.

Wilde's greatest fault is leaving things around where they don't belong. He literally undresses as he steps in the front door. Hat comes off in the hall. Tie drops off after he kisses Pat hello. Coat disappears somewhere in the living room. Shoes come off when he gets down on the floor to play with Wendy. And—well, you get the idea.

Cornel's favorite food is steak, rare and thick. Second favorite is Eastern lobster. And third favorite is pastry with lots of crunchy nuts on top. He does confess to knowing how to cook Hungarian goulash. "But I don't do it right," he declares. "I just put the vegetables in a pot and go to the movies. When I come home I expect it either to be done or burned up."

Cornel's a great movie and stage fan. Every play that comes to Hollywood and every good movie finds the Wildes in the audience. His favorites are Vivien Leigh, Merle Oberon, Robert Donat and Laurence Olivier. He's also fond of music and, incidentally, his favorite composer for the piano has always been Chopin.

SHIRLEY TEMPLE

I REMEMBER:

The back porch of the house where I was born—probably because the dog slept there;
Riding in my red wagon pulled by brother George;
Diapers fastened with huge safety pins worn by the children in my first baby comedies;
My first boy-friend: he attended dancing school and I thought he was tops; I wish I could think of his name;
The time Mrs. Roosevelt cooked a hamburger for me at Hyde Park. I ate only one because I spent my time in a rowboat in the middle of the lake with two rangers. I wouldn't let them row back to shore, and I got a big thrill out of staying so far from land.

MY BROTHERS:

Were older than I and used to treat me like a doll. They'd never praise me no matter what I did, they wouldn't play with me and used to thwart me generally . . . I thought they were wonderful.

MY BIGGEST THRILL:

Was my first roller-coaster ride. I was ten and I thought I'd never get my breath again.

ONCE:

I had to eat fried chicken for a whole afternoon for a scene; The picture wasn't very good, but the chicken was.
I spilled steak sauce on a brand new dress. I was eight; we were in Palm Springs, and the dress was my current pride and joy. I remember being terribly upset and almost immediately forgetting all about it. I suppose I'm just NOT a worrier.

I'M GUILTY OF:

Talking too much;
Losing my temper. I don't show it, but I simply burn up inside. It lasts longer than it would if I could flare out, but I can't.

NOBODY:

Can hurry me. They try, but it never works.

I'VE LEARNED:

A lot from my schoolmates. Until I reached the 7th grade, I had a teacher to myself, so all my grades were "A." When I entered a class, I ran into competition; there were plenty of bright girls to keep me on my toes. They taught me how to get along with people my own age. We graduate in June and are counting days till Commencement. Afterward, perhaps, we'll wonder what was the matter with us and wish we were back in school . . . Or will we?

I HAVE:

No particular pet ambition; I'm willing to leave my career to Mr. Selznick;
No superstitions;
No special unfulfilled wish;
No one bright dream.

I'M WILD ABOUT:

Ching Two, my second Pekinese; Ching-Ching was my first Peke, and I adore him, but Ching Two is just as cute;
Gin rummy, new hair-dos, that blonde baum marten jacket I got Christmas before last;
Chartreuse and red; but I think men like black. Boys overseas write their girls: "Please wear black when I first see you," and the lieutenant I went dancing with in New York asked me to put on something black. Perhaps they think it makes you more sophisticated-looking.

I ADORE:

John Stanley Temple, junior, my nephew. He's going to grow up to be another Van Johnson.

I'M DELIGHTED:

With Canada's invitation to speak in French and English at the beginning of their next war bond drive;
That I'm to do "Kiss and Tell";

I DISLIKE:

Snobs, grapefruit, sticky fingers, bubble baths and crowds—crowds are terrible!

I ENJOY:

Summer flirtations, winter ones, any light, gay sentimental passage, no matter what the season . . . I don't expect to be serious for a long time.

SOMETIMES I WONDER:

If I should give up the screen when I marry. Looking around, it seems that Hollywood marriages are wrecked when the wife is more prominent than the husband, or when her paycheck is bigger than his.

THEN I THINK:

"What am I worrying for? It won't be my problem for years, and maybe Hollywood will have changed by then."

I BELIEVE:

What is to be will be. Why worry? If something is to happen, nothing you can do will stop it. As the army boys say: "If a bullet hasn't your name on it, it can't hurt you." Why sit and stew about whether to go here or stay there? You'll do what you were meant to do.

IT WOULD BE FUN:

To meet Princess Elizabeth and Margaret Rose;
To pilot my own helicopter and learn to take off and land on a dime;
To spend a year in Alaska.

THEY TELL ME:

I'm not the pioneer type. People think of Alaska as ice to the eyebrows and drifts forty feet high; it's not like that all year . . . Anyway, I'd like to try being snow-bound for a season and see if I could take it!

MY GREATEST HONOR:

Since I've grown up, was being asked to speak at the New York Herald-Tribune Forum on "What Motion Pictures Have Done For Youth."

I LOVE:

Grieg's Peer Gynt Suite, horseback riding, Harry James, Kostelanetz, dancing—especially the samba, the rumba and the slow foxtrot.

I FOUND:

Biology interesting, and I liked Science. I never hope to be another Madame Curie, but I think I can appreciate what made her tick.

MY FAVORITE:

Song—believe it or not—is Together from "Since You Went Away";

Hero is Lincoln. I took Lincoln's side in a school debate: Washington vs. Lincoln. I'm afraid my big point was that Washington is on the dollar bill and Lincoln decorates the five-dollar one.

Part was "Wee Willie Winkie." I loved my uniform, and I enjoyed the scene where I'm almost run over by wild horses. I remember they had me count to fifteen, then run as fast as I could across the plain to some rocks, and immediately after I crossed, the horses thundered by. I wanted to do the scene over and over, but they wouldn't let me. I wasn't afraid—I don't remember ever being afraid—and if my mother held her breath, she never let me know.

MY HARDEST SCENE:

Was in "Captain January." I had to descend an iron stair that wound around a lighthouse, saying the multiplication table as I came. This trick was to land on the right step with the right number. I couldn't look down and I thought it would never come right.

IF I COULD LIVE OVER:

Any part of my life. I'd choose my trips to Hawaii. We went over in 1935, in 1937, and in 1939, and each trip was marvelous. Hawaii was a lovely, lazy, relaxing spot.

I JUDGE PEOPLE:

By their eyes, the shape, size, distance between them, their clarity and color, and the way they look at me.

I'M PROUDEST:

Of my two brothers—Jack, in the army Air Forces, George, in the Marine Air Corps;

and

MY GREATEST WISH:

Is that the war will end soon and the boys come home!

DICK CRANE

agile use of the extremeties. Storky mastered his sports the rugged way. He learned to swim because he had no other choice. He was loitering around a swimming pool one day when the instructor, a chap who hated to see a dry pair of swimming trunks, pushed him in. Dick bubbled twice and came up with more aquatic antics in his repertoire than a pixilated porpoise. Thereafter he learned to dive, and before long he was collecting ribbons and medals for winning free style swimming races. This marked the beginning of his love for speed.

One summer, during his high school career, Dick and one of his friends got jobs at Lake Arrowhead for the express purpose of being near the lake where they could swim and go boating. When these activities palled, they hit upon a new way of getting a thrill out of speed: they found a cleared swath, winding sharply down a mountain side, that was used as a ski course in winter. It seemed a colossal shame to have this slide standing idle during the warm months, so the two energetic joes set to work to correct the situation.

Every time they had a few free hours from their duties, they hastened to the mountain side and transported tons of pine needles to be placed as a thick carpet over the course. It was rough work, but within several weeks they had a ski ribbon slicker and faster than the sales talk of a guy selling the Golden Gate Bridge.

At first they waxed their skiis lightly, a scheme that almost catapulted them into the astonished presence of St. Peter. Wax was definitely not needed, so they lightly sanded the skiis for breaking purposes, and continued to fleet down the winding slope with the wind panting to keep abreast. It is reported that genuine storks, passing their namesake on routine mission, peered over their bundles and mumbled, "Now, that's something like!"

The most remarkable part of this incident is that Mr. Crane didn't get his neck broken; a remarkable fact that has continued to crop up as a result of his admiration for rapid mileage.

The summer after Dick was graduated from High School, he went to work for a Hollywood automobile dealer, and abruptly decided just what profession he wanted to adopt. His duties for the dealer included driving out to the homes of various cinema celebrities on a motorbike, fastening the bike to the back of the car, and driving the car to the garage for thousand-mile checks, or other repairs. Those cars were really something. They were custom-built Cadillacs, low-slung Hispano Suizas, high-powered Mercedes-Benzs. There were town cars, rakish convertibles, and sleek cabriolets. And they were faster on the pickup than a sailor on eight-hour pass.

Ownership of such a surrey became one of Dick's chief objectives. Method of acquiring the needed moola? That was his problem.

For the first time he consulted his athletic prowess as a commercial possibility. He had been working out at a local gymnasium occasionally, and he had gone a good many rounds with various men in training. A fighter, he cogitated, frequently did very well if he used his noodle for something other than a basket for his opponent's blows. So Dick put out a few feelers among the fistic arrangers. How about a prelim?

Many people had seen Dick handle himself in casual bouts and they didn't like the look of that left. They stalled, an attitude that only encouraged the Automotive Kid. Finally he got a bout. He was pretty set up about it. In anticipation he ate a huge steak for dinner, then went down to the stadium and got dressed.

His first impression of being a leather-pusher was that the life was confusing. The arena was so filled with smoke that he could neither see nor breathe. The noise was like that of the 42nd and Broadway subway station. His opponent was a grizzled veteran of, not only the normal run of prelim bouts, but apparently a few trips over a gravel road and several encounters with broken bottles.

This businesslike pachyderm went to work on Dick's middle. Storky's lethal left landed several times—once so squarely that this versus went down onto the canvas with a grunt. Dick was so astonished that, instead of retiring into a neutral corner, he stood there staring at the prone fighter and reminding himself that it would look odd if he helped the man to his feet. Patently, Crane lacked the killer instinct. He was just a nice guy trying to make a million bucks.

In the next few rounds, Dick came to the conclusion that he was constructed of a bellows where his lungs should be, and a pair of spaghetti legs. He was never knocked down but how can a man be knocked down when his stomach is glue into which a leather glove is burying itself and having difficulty withdrawing?

Decision: Dick lost on a TKO, which means Technical Knock-Out, in case youse don't read Damon Runyan.

When Dick reached home, his mother was waiting up for him. She uttered a little cry at sight of his battered countenance. "I'm okay," he insisted from between swollen lips. "The other guy was just a little too fast for me."

The more he thought it over, the more Dick came to the conclusion that there must be an easier method of making a million. The answer must lie in cunning rather than in cudgels. So he broke training and started to do the town in hope of getting a bright idea from contact with bright lights.

He was coming home around 3 o'clock one morning, after having been out that late for two weeks in succession (imbibing nothing but cokes, of course, as he still believed in keeping training in matters gastronomic), when he quietly went to sleep at the wheel and drove off the road into a field, taking a section of fence and other rural obstructions with him. His car was demolished and Dick escaped death by the skin of his teeth—some of which were badly damaged.

Later, when he looked over his battered buggy, Dick remembered again how essential it was for him to own an elegant equipage, and decided that maybe he could be vividly successful at commercial art. His best subjects at school had been drawing, both mechanical and mimic-Varga, so he gathered up some of his sketches and called upon the Disney Studios. Did they need an animator, he wanted to know?

"These," said the interviewer, clearing his throat, "show promise. Definite promise. But . . . er . . . don't you think you should have a little added instruction? To work for Mr. Disney you should know perspective, color value, and the humorous tricks possible to the drawing pencil."

"Yes, sir," agreed Dick. "I'll get busy."

So he enrolled in night classes at the Chouinard Art Institute in Los Angeles.

Working all day and half the night was rough going. It began to prey on the mind of Storky, the speedster. One day one of the men in the automobile agency observed, when Dick drove in at the wheel of a chromium plated job with four forward speeds and more class than a consolidated school, "You look okay, bud. Probably the frills along the way figured you were a star, yourself!"

Dick was somewhat exasperated with himself that he hadn't thought of the picture route to smooth cars before. Of course, he had never taken any particular interest in high school dramatics—always too busy with the muscular arts. But why not? What was the first step?

The first step obviously was dramatic school, so he enrolled at the Bliss-Hayden Little Theatre, where after some preliminary training, he was cast in "Goodbye, My Love."

Learning his lines was easier than looking twice at Anne Baxter, so it appeared that Dick was that valued thing in the theatre, a quick study. Came opening night. A few peekers-through-a-hole-in-the-curtain brought back the news that a Metro talent scout was in the audience. Dick wanted to know what all the fuss was about. A talent scout was just another guy; if the play was good he would be impressed exactly as much as the observer from the Consolidated Cement Works, would he?

Entirely confident, Dick strode onto the stage on cue and opened his mouth to deliver his initial line. A hideous thing happened; he couldn't remember the line to save his neck; even if he had been able to recall it, his voice wouldn't have functioned. The spirit was willing but the flesh couldn't speak. Centuries, eons, ages passed through Dick's mind. The mock geraniums in the window box died, were covered by the debris of geology, and turned into coal.

And then, just as Dick and the rest of the cast were turning to stone, an odd thing happened. Some imp in Dick's mind said, "What has you licked, son? The presence of all these people? Well, suppose they were all wearing nothing but striped shorts? They'd look pretty silly, wouldn't they? Even sillier than you look, standing here in your tongue-tied dilemma?"

And out poured the words for which he had been waiting, much to the relief of all concerned. From that day to this, when Dick has an important conference with someone by whom he might be overawed, he strolls into the office thinking of the man clad only in loud shorts. This idea supplies Dick with a humorous, faintly superior expression that ingratiates him to everyone. Stop! Stop! He thinks of women, always, as being clad in an 1890 bathing suit. (We knew you would be worried about that.)

As a result of his work at Bliss-Hayden, Dick was signed by Metro for the juvenile role in "Susan and God," with Joan Crawford and Fredric March. Normally such a break would mean the beginning of a non-stop picture career, but after his first plum role, Dick walked his way through a swarm of B's. When he wasn't droning through a quickie, he found other jobs around Hollywood. He washed dishes in a restaurant, hashed and hopped cars at a Drive-In, sold gas, drove a truck, and helped to lay conduit. Sometimes he did a bit of radio work, and occasionally he did a play in a Little Theatre.

When war broke out he charged down to enlist, but his record of fourteen mastoid operations, and his two broken ear drums, condemned him to permanent medical deferment. However, the army did use him in a training short used for the instruction of new cavalrymen. Which is to say that Dick and the men who worked with him had to learn the horsemanship in six weeks that is thereafter learned by cavalry candidates in six months.

As soon as his sinews had returned to normal color, and all his contusions, bruises, and blisters were healed, Dick took his new accomplishment over to the Hopalong Cassidy unit where he thought it would look well in hoss operas. "We're glad to get you," the second assistant director said. "We need someone with your experience to make this jump."

"I'm your man," said Dick, climbing into a western saddle for the first time thinking idly that it was somewhat different from the military saddle to which he had become painfully accustomed. He walked the horse up to sniff the barrier over which they were to jump; he sniffed a little, too—with apprehension.

In the subsequent thirty seconds, Dick Crane became the only known human being to execute a sitting, standing, back-flip-half-Gainor into a body of water one inch deep. He got credit for being exotic if not equestrian.

After that, Lady Luck—probably snickering slightly—came to Storky's rescue. She got him cast in "Dr. Gillespie's Criminal Story," in "Stage Door Canteen," and in 20th Century's brilliant "Happy Land." His next biggie was "Wing and a Prayer," in which he was shown bare-torsoed. When the preview cards came in on that one, Mr. Storky began to look like a box office eagle.

Further vital statistics: Dick's steady is Kay Morley, one of the Goldwyn Girls; he lives in a small house in Laurel Canyon, wherein he cooks his own steaks when he has enough points. He plays excellent tennis, loves to fish—both deep sea and mountain streams—and bowls in a mediocre manner.

He reads a great deal, is conservative about formal clothes, but likes his sport togs to resemble a riot in a camouflage plant. He enjoys long-hair music, and his dancing is strictly Lombardo, but he has no objection to watching an occasional couple castigate the carpet.

In short, Storky is a smoothie, and you'll be seeing him in better and better parts—you lucky people!

PEGGY RYAN

Ryan were in the groove, off the screen, too.

There was a time when people used to think they were secretly in love. "We'd laugh up our sleeves at that," says Peggy. They were too much alike to be in love. But they were very good friends; had fought their way up together. Off the screen they were like a brother and sister act; they kidded each other, played practical jokes on each other, exchanged friendly advice, and never, never stole scenes from each other.

When Donald had something on his mind, there was a special bench in the Ryan house where he used to like to come and sit. And he'd say to Peg, "Listen, Mrs. Anthony, what shall I do?" For Peg was his Mrs. Anthony, sure enough—and he was her Mr. Anthony.

"In some ways," Peggy says, "we were closer to each other than two people in love. For people in love try to hide their faults from each other. But I knew Donnie's faults and he knew mine. When I scolded Donnie, it was like bawling myself out. There was never a bit of advice I gave him that I wouldn't have been better off for following myself. Like telling Donnie not to be so impulsive! Even Donnie couldn't beat me that way. I'm almost bugs, the way I follow impulses."

Donald's getting married didn't change their friendship at all. Donald and Gwen Carter were both Peggy's friends. And if they had a fight or something, they'd be apt to call in Peggy as referee!

There never was any moonlight and roses stuff between Peggy and Donald. But no girl ever had a better friend.

So then came his call to the service. Universal, knowing that Donald and Peggy were strictly solid senders, put them into five pictures together, one after another, trying to get out as many as possible before the magic team broke up. "Bowery to Broadway" was the last of the five.

Donald stood on the set in his crazy moustache; Peggy was all dressed up in her bustle, chanting, "He took me for a sleigh-ride in the good old summer time."

That was part of the scene she was supposed to make. Now usually, when Peggy and Donald have a scene to make together, they finish it quickly. They groove it right away—and never, never fluff their lines. Their director never had to film the same scene more than once or twice. In their very first take, the gate would always swing wide.

But that last scene in "Bowery to Broadway" was different. They just couldn't get it right. They kept fluffing their lines. They just didn't have that old upbeat.

It took them a solid hour to get that scene right.

"We knew this was the last scene we'd make together till the war was over," Peggy says. "We couldn't bear parting—so we spent an hour on the last close-up."

When she thought about what it would be like to make her next picture without Donald, Peggy was scared. She told the O'Connor so. "Mr. Big," she said (she has a million nicknames for him), "I don't know what I'll do in pictures without you. I'll be awfully stiff and awkward."

"Pretend I'm there," he said. "I will be, in spirit."

Actually, he was there in more than spirit. For quite some time, the Army stationed Donald at Palm Springs. And whenever he got a week-end pass, he'd come to Hollywood, then go out to Universal, and spend some of his time watching Peg from the wings.

"You're doing fine, Peggy," he'd tell her, and watch the old light come back into her eyes.

There was a time when Donald thought it was awful that Peg was going to be turned into a glamour girl. "Not my Peg!" he moaned. "Why can't she just be herself?"

But he didn't quite realize that Peggy was growing up. When he saw her in a black satin gown, looking as if she'd been poured into it, he swallowed hastily. She was all dressed up to vamp him in "Patrick the Great"—and she did (for picture purposes only, of course).

"Babes on Swing Street" was the first picture Peggy made without Donald. Before she made it, she had a long talk with Dan Kelley, the casting director (executive in charge of talent, directors and writers).

"I know this picture is important," she said. "Donnie and I are kind of like ham and eggs. People are going to love to say, 'Peggy Ryan certainly needs Donald O'Connor.' Well, we can't have him. I know that. So my pictures without him have to be especially good. And please, please, don't put me opposite any other young boy, the way Donald and I were teamed. There's no other boy who can take his place."

Uncle Dan knew that what she said was strictly so. There was no magician's hat out of which he could suddenly pull another O'Connor. So he and the rest of the big shots at Universal decided to let Peggy groove it on her own.

For the love interest, they put in Ann Blyth and Billy Dunn. The only man they cast with Peggy was Andy Devine, who played her father.

"Working without Donald was really hard," admits Peggy. "I had to readjust myself. I never worried about anything Donnie and I did together. But trying to put across a comedy scene by myself—that was different. I felt as if I couldn't bear not to work with Donald. But after all, what could we do?

"There is no chance of Donnie's getting out of the Army. He wouldn't want to, and I wouldn't want him to.

"I hated to do anything without him. But this period, when I have to work alone, will perhaps be good for both of us. Donald and I would both like to grow up a little bit in pictures. We can't stay jive-happy sixteen-year-olds forever. These pictures I'm making now are a kind of bridge to go into the things we'll want to do after the war. I'll have a chance to mature a little. And Donald, being in the Army, will mature, too—especially since he's married."

She chuckled a little at that—and you could see the old, pert Peg on the beam again. A kid like Peg may be blue once in a while; but she's no icky, to go glooming around all the time.

A little schmaltz now and then for old time's sake—okay—then she picks up from there, and goes sailing along.

"After the war's over," she says, "I sure hope Donald and I will be teamed together again. But in the meanwhile, I'll just have to carry on alone, or with older men."

Not only has the hep queen lost her king in pictures, but she and the former top man in her private life have parted. He was Sergeant Ray Hirsch, a technical Sergeant in the Marines. For almost three years, he was Peg's heartbeat, and she was his. When she walked out of her house, she was always loaded down with Marine pins and insignia and ribbons which Sergeant Ray had given her.

She thought he was her man of the moment, day, year and forever. He thought she was his. Still, some note was missing in their love symphony. Had they really been desperately in love, Peggy would probably have walked down the aisle to that old Lohengrin march.

Sergeant Hirsch wanted her to. But Peggy's always been afraid of a war marriage. "I don't think," she says, "two people who love each other can be happy if they have to be separated. Of course if you fall madly in love—like a modern Romeo and Juliet—boom, girl, and you're dead! The wedding bells just have to peel then, like they did for O'Connor and Gwen.

"But if you're not madly in love, then I think you should wait.

"What really scared me off immediate marriage was seeing so many marriages of the people I knew go sour. I saw it happen to Deanna Durbin, Mickey Rooney, Judy Garland—and I got scared. It's hard for a girl who's independent to make a success of marriage. When she gets mad she can say, 'All right, if you don't like it, I'll walk out of here. I can always take care of myself.' I didn't want that sort of thing to happen to Ray and me. And yet I wasn't ready—I'm not ready now—to settle down to being just a housewife.

"So Ray said, 'All right, if you feel that way about it, Peggy, maybe we'd better break our engagement, and you can look around and see if there's someone you care for more.' "

When Donald heard Peggy had broken her engagement, he called her up and said, "Listen, my girl, maybe you and I should have a serious talk." So she cried on his shoulder and said, "Honest, Don, I don't know whether I'm doing the right thing or not." When she finished telling him about it, she felt better.

"So now," says Peggy, "I'm free, white and twenty, and I'm looking around. Ray and I are still friends, but no longer engaged. All my ex-fiancés are my friends. I've been engaged four times, but it never took. I'm afraid I sound fickle, but marriage is such a serious step.

"I don't think I'll ever be engaged again. Next time, I'll get married but not engaged."

And then Peggy laughed at her own seriousness. "Knowing myself," she said, "I'm afraid the next time I see you, I'll be saying, 'Well, I'm engaged again.'"

Maybe. The pot is boiling, the romances are brewing; but so far there's nothing serious to report. Really those brewing romances are just friendships. Peggy, being free and single, is having a wonderful time, and goes out with lots of boys, several of whom have tried to sell her on the idea of

Tired Kidneys Often Bring Sleepless Nights

Doctors say your kidneys contain 15 miles of tiny tubes or filters which help to purify the blood and keep you healthy. When they get tired and don't work right in the daytime, many people have to get up nights. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder. Don't neglect this condition and lose valuable, restful sleep.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may also cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush-out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

marriage. So far, no sale. Among her boy friends are Len Drouillard, a French Canadian hockey player who taught her to ice skate; Mel Tormé, the actor, singer and drummer in "Pardon My Rhythm," who wrote a beautiful song dedicated to Peggy called "Peggy Mine;" Glen Rose, a publicity man. Then there's John Pirrone, an old friend who appeared with her when she was four in Gus Edwards' show, "The Wedding of Jack and Jill." She still goes out with him.

The most promising friendship, perhaps, is that with Lt. Charles F. Maxwell, whom she met when she was in "Meet the People" and who is now overseas throwing everything he's got against the Japs. Peggy hadn't heard from Lt. Maxwell for months and months, when she got a letter from him saying, "I guess you're married by now." Quick like a flash, she wrote him no, she wasn't—and well, we'll see what we shall see.

Peggy says she's had a number of crushes, but hasn't actually been in love since the big break-up with Sergeant Hirsch.

"I'm just coasting along, having loads of fun, going to the fights and the baseball games. The Mocambo and Trocadero are all right for those who like them, or when you want to show off a new hat, but I like jam sessions, legitimate shows and ballets at the Hollywood Bowl."

Though Peggy is obviously hep and can swing to all the riffs and licks, she isn't one hundred per cent gut-bucket. She and Ray used to go out of this world with all the other gut-buckets, because he was a champion jitterbug; but now that their romance has crashed, she likes the rumba and the samba just as much as barrel-house jive—maybe more, sometimes.

She recently celebrated her twentieth birthday. I know, I know, she doesn't look twenty, but she is. Donald O'Connor helped to cut the cake. Peggy had bought a home for her folks in Burbank—a dream home with a big rumpus room—and she and her folks threw caution to the winds, and invited 150 kids. The place was a bedlam because each kid brought about four more. Donald and Peggy put on a show for the crowd. (He was in uniform, on a pass). The crowd hollered and cheered; the neighbors poked their heads out of the windows, and wondered when that jive-happy crowd would go home.

Peggy got ninety-seven presents, including a pinball machine and a slot machine. Among the presents was one from Donald and Gwen that fairly took her breath away. Peggy says maybe I shouldn't print it, for the present was a black georgette nightgown. "What will people think of me getting a gift like that!" But Donald said it went with Peggy's new glamour—and Gwen, his wife, thought it was just the right kind of gift for Peg.

Jack Oakie delivered the birthday spanks. Peggy calls Jack "Sonny Boy", they've worked in two pictures together and will do a third soon, "That's the Spirit."

Not long after the birthday party, Peggy went to New York. Before she went, everyone she knew told her just what to do in New York. She was to see "Voice of the Turtle" for George—a man in the publicity department at Universal! do a time step on Times Square for Ray McDonald of "Winged Victory"; go to the Stork for Glen Rose; see "Oklahoma" for her fitter.

Of course, Peggy had been in New York before, but that was when she was appearing in the show, "Meet the People," getting about $42.50 a week, and not quite as big a success as she is now. In fact, the Ryans were sometimes broke in those days.

"Do you think I'm getting high-hat?" she asked me anxiously. "My girl friend is now my secretary. I never thought I'd have a secretary; but Turhan Bey and Ella Raines have, so I thought—why not Peggy?"

The truth is that her fan mail has gone into such terrific proportions that she couldn't cope with it all without some help.

When I first met Peggy a year ago, she struck me as being the youngest, gayest, jiviest girl I'd ever met. She talked a mile a minute; her feet and head and hands were never still.

She's still jivy as ever, and young and gay. She flounces her skirt, bounces along when she walks—but with all that, she's more serious now about some things.

When she thinks about the war and what it's done to people, she goes all hot and cold and feels like bawling her heart out. She spent a whole month on a hospital tour recently. Friends warned her she wouldn't be able to take it, but she did—like a trouper, though her heart broke many times at the things she saw. She never played a scene on the screen the equal of some of the scenes she played for the boys in the service.

And they adore her. They write her letters telling her she's their ideal of the American girl, the girl next door. She reminds them of their own "best girls", and that gets her.

Recently a bunch of boys on Saipan—sailor lads who were slated for an "incident", in other words combat with the Japs—were given as a special treat before they took off, a chance to see Peggy whooping it up in "This Is the Life." The picture sent them.

When the battle was over, the boys cried, "On with Ryan." Then they decided the picture had done so much for their morale that they would take up a collection to buy a present for the Ryan girl. They did, and solemnly decided that the first sailor in their group to set foot in the United States again was to buy a present for Peggy with the money.

Elmer Michael was the first boy in the group to get back to the United States. When he got to San Diego, he spent over $2.00 in nickels trying to locate an aunt of Peggy's who lived in San Diego. No dice. Finally he got hold of the manager of the Orpheum Theatre in San Diego, who called Peggy Ryan. Of course, she was thrilled when she heard the story, and still more excited when Michael met her for the first time and handed her a gold bracelet with crosses on it, and a green compact. "I picked them myself and gee, I hope you like them," he said.

Peggy, knowing what the bracelet represented, got a lump in her throat as big as an egg when he told her that.

And that's Peggy today—the Peggy who is bravely going on alone, because what else can she do? And yet she's not really alone. For Donald, just as he said, is always with her, in spirit.

THE END

WORDS OF MUSIC

When Frank Sinatra played the New York Paramount Theatre, his loyal bobby-socks brigade really gave him a reception. In fact, that's a masterpiece of understatement. They practically tore the place apart. I don't know what arrangements the kids made about school, but from what I saw, there must have been thousands who had some explaining to do to the attendance office.

The New York police department had a time of it, too. They were all over the theatre, inside and out, trying to keep the crowds in order. Each time Frank arrived and departed, his fans would scream and carry on like mad. "How hysterical can they get?" one officer on horseback remarked, as he ordered some especially determined girls away from the stage door. "All the cuckoos aren't in clocks!"

But The Voice, with his usual poise, took it all in his stride, including a little egg-throwing. He did five and six shows a day, plus his broadcasts and camp appearances. Don't ever think Frank is as weak as he looks. He'd have to be physically strong, to take the pace!

Sinatra's protegée, Eileen Barton, the singing lass on his Vimms radio program, appeared with him at the Paramount. Though only eighteen, she performed like a veteran. Eileen has a fine voice, and I predict it won't be long until she is at the top of the ladder.

Benny Goodman must have decided once and for all to sit out his agency contract with the Music Corporation of America before reorganizing his band, because he pops up as one of the stars in Billy Rose's new Broadway musical, "The Seven Lively Arts." Benny is appearing with his recently formed quintet, which is just about the best small combination he has ever had. It couldn't be anything less than terrific, with Teddy Wilson on piano, Sid Weiss on bass, Morey Feld on drums, Red Norvo on vibra-harp, and the great Goodman clarinet.

Artie Shaw, another guy who plays a little clarinet, has signed a contract to record exclusively for Victor. According to present plans, he will break in his new seventeen-piece band on one nighters, and then start a theatre tour some time in December.

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC:

Victor:

Record dealers should have no trouble selling Tommy Dorsey's platter of "Two In Love," even though it was made a few years ago and has been released before, because Frank Sinatra sings the vocal chorus. "Whispering" is on the reverse side, done as an instrumental and featuring Tommy's trombone.

Another re-issue is Glenn Miller's "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," with Tex Beneke, Marion Hutton and The Modernaires. Flip it over and you find "Helpless," sung by Ray Eberle.

Here are two by Ellington, new releases, but made a few years back—"I Don't Mind," with a vocal by Ivie Anderson, and "What Am I Here For?" an instrumental with good solo work by Rex Stewart and Johnny Hodges.

Cole Porter's tune, "It Might Have Been," has been recorded by Hal McIntyre, with lyrics by Jerry Stuart and The Four Lyttle Sisters. On the other side we find a little jump ditty entitled "Daisy May," written by Hal and Billy May, when they played together in Glenn Miller's band.

Bunny Berigan, the great trumpet star who passed away two years ago, is honored by Victor with their release of The Berigan Memorial Album, a four-record set of some of the tunes Bunny made with his own band, including the famous "I Can't Get Started With You," "Frankie and Johnnie," and "Russian Lullaby."

Decca:

Ella Fitzgerald and The Ink Spots have doubled up talents again for "I'm Making Believe" and "Into Each Life Some Rain Must Fall."

Helen Forrest does "Every Day Of My Life" and "I Learned A Lesson I'll Never Forget," with Victor Young's orchestra.

Phil Hanna, one of Decca's newer artists, sings "It's A Crying Shame" and "Forget-Me-Nots In Your Eyes."

"Sweet Dreams, Sweetheart," and "Moon On My Pillow" serve as the two tunes for Jimmy Dorsey's latest. Teddy Walters handles the singing chores for both. "Sweet Dreams" is one of the numbers Jimmy's band does in the Warner picture, "Hollywood Canteen."

Russ Morgan and his "Music in the Morgan Manner" are heard on "Dance With A Dolly" (With a Hole In Her Stockin') with an Al Jennings vocal and "There Goes That Song Again," with Russ himself lyricizing.

Here's a wonderful new album by Judy Garland, the whole score from her new picture, "Meet Me In St. Louis." The songs, written by Hugh Martin and Ralph Blane, are really swell: "The Trolley Song" (already a hit), "Have Yourself A Merry Little Christmas," "The Boy Next Door," "Meet Me In St. Louis," and "Skip To My Lou." There is one additional tune, "Boys and Girls," by Rodgers and Hammerstein, which was cut out of the picture after the album was recorded. Oddly enough, it was also cut out of the original score of "Oklahoma."

Bing Crosby and the Andrews Sisters have joined forces again, this time for "Don't Fence Me In," and "The Three Caballeros." "Don't Fence Me In" is a Cole Porter tune from "Hollywood Canteen," and "Three Caballeros" is from the Walt Disney production of the same name. Vic Schoen's orchestra and arrangements.

Andy Kirk and His Clouds of Joy jump in with "Baby, Don't You Tell Me No Lie" and "Fare Thee, Honey, Fare Thee Well." June Richmond sings both.

It doesn't come under the heading of popular music, but don't miss Decca's wonderful album of "Alice In Wonderland," with Ginger Rogers as Alice, and a terrific score composed and directed by Victor Young. It is one of the most delightful things I have ever heard.

Capitol:

Andy Russell, who is coming up fast in the crooner race, offers two new ballads, "I Dream Of You" and "Magic

Is The Moonlight," with Paul Weston's orchestra.

If you're in the mood for a bit of that thar' cowboy music, there's Tex Ritter's "We Live In Two Different Worlds," and "Jealous Heart."

June Hutton, the feminine voice of the Pied Pipers' quartet, does a good solo job on "Don't You Know I Care" and "Sleigh Ride In July," backed up by Paul Weston's music.

That jivin' girl, Ella Mae Morse, sings Cole Porter's oldie, "Why Shouldn't I?" and "Hello, Suzanne" on her new release. Ella Mae was a big success on her return engagement at New York's Capitol Theatre.

Stan Kenton steps in with his version of "Sweet Dreams, Sweetheart," with Gene Howard in the vocal department, and "Gotta Be Gettin'," with Anita O'Day's chirping.

If you're stumped as to what to give your little niece or nephew for Christmas, give a listen to Capitol's album, "Stories For Children," eight sides of narrations with music by Harold Peary (The Great Gildersleeve). Included are "Jack And The Beanstalk," "Puss In Boots," and "Rumpelstiltskin."

Columbia:

If you like that groanin' man, Bing Crosby, you'll surely want "Crosby Classics," an album containing ten of his biggest hits of the past: "Please," "Some of These Days," "I've Got The World On A String," "Down The Old Ox Road," "How Deep Is The Ocean," "Home On The Range," "The Last Round-Up," "Thanks," "My Honey's Lovin' Arms," and "Shine." The latter two are with the Mills Brothers. The original platters of these tunes are collectors' items, so if you don't have them, now is your chance!

Ginny Simms has recorded two new ones, "Don't Ever Change" and "Wish You Were Waiting For Me." Both have vocal chorus backgrounds.

Gene Autry fans will be happy with his singing of two cowboy ballads, "Purple Sage In The Twilight" and "If You Only Believed In Me."

Freddy Martin is now a business man, with his new Maestro Record Company. He has waxed two tunes with his own band, "Just Close Your Eyes" and "Better Do It Now," and two songs by Georgia Gibbs, "Wish You Were Waiting For Me" and "The Trolley Song." These discs won't be available for general distribution in music stores for a while, but if you particularly want them, I suggest you write the Maestro Company, 1515 North Vine Street, Hollywood, 28, California, and mention that you read about them in this column.

ON THE BEAM:

The new Chesterfield Music show over C.B.S., Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays, is a solid quarter hour. There are songs by Johnny Johnston and Monica Lewis, music by Paul Baron's orchestra, and chit-chat by Martin Block, New York's popular disc jockey. Baron's band is one of the best radio outfits I've heard, featuring such prominent sidemen as Billy Butterfield, Yank Lawson, Sid Weiss, and Will Bradley. Phil Moore, talented composer of "Shoo, Shoo, Baby," is doing much of the arranging.

Another good radio program you should try to catch if you like your menu musical is N.B.C.'s "For The Record," on Monday nights. This is the show from which the Army records their "V-Discs" for shipment to fighting fronts all over the world. You'll hear everything from swing to symphony, with a different group of artists each week—all top names in the entertainment field.

If you like Eddy Howard, listen to "Carton of Smiles" over N.B.C. on Wednesdays. Besides handling the musical reins, Eddy shares vocal honors with Carol Bruce.

Raymond Scott continues to come through with one of the best daytime musical programs, with his versatile half-hour, Monday through Friday over C.B.S.

(For time and station on all broadcasts, be sure to check your local newspaper).

JAM NOTES:

Jess Stacy left Horace Heidt a few weeks ago, and is still toying with the idea of organizing his own band. Jess tells me that if his plans go through, his wife, Lee Wiley, will be his vocalist. . . . Woody Herman has added a girl vibra-harpist to his band. And Charlie Spivak is another leader who is planning a feminine addition to his aggregation in the person of a girl harpist. Charlie is also going to add two French horns.

Maxine Sullivan has been singing at New York's Blue Angel club. Though her voice seems more mature, she still has that same relaxed quality which brought her fame on records. . . . Lee Castle was really thrilled when his new band was set for a long run at the New Yorker Hotel. Just about a year ago, he played the same spot—as a sideman in Benny Goodman's orchestra.

Martha Tilton will tour theatres, when she finishes her second picture for P.R.C., "Crime, Inc." . . . Vaughn Monroe has become a papa again, with the arrival of another girl, name of Christina. Incidentally, Vaughn's vocalist, Marilyn Duke, who was a decided brunette, is now a decided blonde. . . . Ginnie Powell decided to hold off on picture offers for a while and joined Gene Krupa's band, instead. But she'll probably appear with Gene in his forthcoming film for R.K.O., "George White's Scandals."

Buddy Stewart, who sang with Claude Thornhill before both he and Claude went into the service, has been discharged and is now handling the male vocals for Krupa. . . . The Andrews Sisters have been very successful in their concert tour. When the girls get back to California, La Verne will be married to Lou Rogers, a technical director in the music department at Universal Studios. . . . Billie Holliday and Eddie Heywood, Jr., are the newest addition to the Decca Records contract list. . . . Andy Russell is the happiest guy in the world over his success in New York. He was a big hit in his nightclub engagement at the Versailles and he realized one of his greatest ambitions by being signed for the Paramount Theatre. Of course his records have been selling like hot cakes all over the country. But there's one boy whose hat size won't change!

So long for the nonce. If you're puzzled about any little musical item, drop me a note and I'll try to straighten you out. But not too many questions, and don't forget to enclose a self-addressed stamped envelope. Write Jill Warren, MOVIELAND MAGAZINE, 1476 Broadway, New York City.

PHILLIP TERRY

slaving at Herculean tasks, half-starving in the London equivalent of a garret, and hope-after-hope-deferred making a man heartsick. It isn't a grim story, because it never seems to have occurred to Phillip to take life that way.

It was in San Francisco one March 7th that the doctor announced: "It's a boy!" to the Terry family, but most of Phil's early years were spent in boom towns of the oil country, in Texas and Oklahoma. His father is a research chemist who invented a process for "cracking" gasoline.

Phil worked in the oil fields during school vacations, and helped in his father's experimental laboratory up in California's hottest inland valley when the thermometer hit the ceiling and a furnace had to be tended, chiefly by Phil.

"I like labor," he observed. "When my father first started his own plant, we had very little money and we did practically everything ourselves. It was a thrill to see how much we could do. Just this last year, as my contribution to war work, I dug ditches, laid floors, poured molten pig iron into moulds—one crucible weighed upwards of 150 pounds—at the foundry my father and I have in Glendale.

"As I say, hard physical labor appeals to me. But as time went on and the little plant prospered, we hired more men. I was made manager and had to run the office. I hated that, as I hate all white-collar work. To me, columns of figures on paper, filing systems, all the details of offices represent a fearful grind. I stuck it out only because my father is my friend and I was eager to help him."

Phil still enjoys hard, physical labor and finds it relaxing to build a garden wall, dig a foundation, swing a hoe.

"Joan's like that, too," he boasts. "Since we can't get gardeners, she has clipped the hedge, cut down a tree and trimmed shrubs like mad."

That love of using muscles took Phil, as might have been expected, into sports at high school, where he was a member of the track team at Sacred Heart College, San Francisco, and manager of that school's football eleven.

His ambition then was to be a navy doctor. His father was an Annapolis man and Phil's first keen disappointment came when bad eyes caused his rejection. His eyes had troubled him since childhood and have prevented his joining any branch of the service in the present war. He did not give up his medical ambition, however, until he had completed eight semesters at Stanford University. Medicine and the years of close study seemed an endless, deadly grind.

A man named Gordon Davis may have had his influence. He persuaded Phil to take part in college theatricals and directed him in several plays. And there he was, "caught in the spell," liking the theater. After his eighth semester in medicine, he shocked his parents by announcing that he was leaving college—to act.

"My family didn't care for the idea," he admits. "Their hearts were set on my graduating from Stanford. But they have always been wonderful to me, never laying down the law, but understanding and sympathizing. I was carefully taught what was right and what was wrong. I hope I can teach our children as well. After that teaching, my father said: 'I don't care what you decide to be, son. All I ask is that you be a good one.' So the family said as little as possible about their disappointment and agreed that I should try for a stage career.

"That was 1930. Talkies had just come in, depression was on, the stage was supposed to be all washed up—no stock companies, no road companies. I thought of pictures, of course, but that was the time no studio would look at a man who wasn't English. Unless you spoke with a clipped accent and a very broad a, you weren't worth listening to. I decided to take my savings and go to the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art in London."

The fact that the Royal Academy accepted him must have been encouraging, for over there dramatic training is taken seriously, and a graduate of the famous school is given an actors' equity card, completion of the course being considered the equivalent of experience.

Phillip concentrated on his classes, especially those dealing with correct speech. Concentrated too intensely, as it turned out, for during his attendance at the Academy Alexander Korda sent for him to do the role of an American in one of his pictures.

"And I was so very, very British by that time I simply couldn't twist my tongue around the American r! Korda looked at my test, and got someone else."

When it happened, it wasn't so funny. Phil needed film experience, the prestige of the Korda name, and the money. He'd never had so little money. Even after he had graduated and was playing bits on the stage, his salary was only twenty shillings—about five dollars a week. Week, not day! Out of this, he had to pay for food and "digs" (lodging).

Once he had a room with another boy in Bloomsbury, a big room in a dreadful old house. The bath was two flights up, the lavatory, diagonally above them, leaked so that one wall was always damp and musty. For half their combined salaries, they got this room plus breakfast, which they ate as late as it was served.

"Our only other meal each day, we ate at Bertorillos' in Soho, an old Italian restaurant where they gave you a big bowl of minestrone—soup full of vegetables, noodles, spaghetti, macaroni and cheese—for three pence, and a big piece of bread for a penny."

He didn't starve; he didn't really mind this way of life. It was all part of a new, wonderful experience. He was young, ambitious, romantic, and he dreamed beautiful dreams. He would stay in England until he had worked up to important roles in important plays, when American producers would send for him.

He played in stock and repertory in Hull, Manchester, Birmingham, Croyden and Brighton. Everyone helped him. The whole profession, it seemed to him, offered eager hands to the beginner. It wouldn't be long now, he thought after four years, be-

These people buy a battleship —every week!

Meet John S....... and Mary D.......

John works at an electronics plant on Long Island, and makes $85 a week. Almost 16% of it goes into War Bonds.

Mary has been driving rivets into bombers at an airplane plant on the West Coast. She makes $55 a week, and puts 14% of it into War Bonds.

John and Mary are typical of more than 27 million Americans on the Payroll Savings Plan who, every single month, put half a BILLION dollars into War Bonds. That's enough to buy one of those hundred-million-dollar battleships every week, with enough money for an aircraft carrier and three or four cruisers left over.

When this war is won, and we start giving credit where credit is due, don't forget John and Mary. After the fighting men, they deserve a place at the top. They've earned it.

6th WAR LOAN

fore he could expect something fine.

At 2 a.m. a cable from America arrived. Phil's father was dying: he must come home at once. At .10 that same morning, he was on the Bremen as she moved out into the Channel.

"My mother was in Panama on her way to England to see me, when she got that same cable," he recalls. "I made better connections and was home first. My father didn't die—he's still alive, thank heaven—but he was ill for a long time, and I had to take over management of his small foundry in Glendale. I used to pitch in and do some of the hard work there, to help me through my anxiety for him and my continuing disappointments in Hollywood."

Phil had turned to the screen to continue his career. He visited every agent listed, but to them his stage experience meant nothing and no one would take him. He was deeply discouraged before his friend Vince Lawrence was able to interest Al Hall in one Phillip Terry, and even then it was some time before that interest eventuated in a radio contract with CBS.

In the summer of 1937, CBS scheduled a series of Shakespearean plays with famous stars. Phil played leading roles in these plays, with such actors as Burgess Meredith, Walter Abel, Ian Keith and Thomas Mitchell. They all said nice things about Phil's voice and dramatic ability, but it was Thomas Mitchell who arranged to direct him in a test at Columbia Studios.

"I was dreadfully nervous—I'm always nervous on 'first nights'." Phil illustrated this with his fifth cigarette, exaggeratedly. "I didn't make the grade. Columbia turned me down... but the test reached MGM, and they gave me a contract!"

He was elated. NOW he'd get somewhere, NOW the gates would open, NOW he'd show them what he could do! He got one good part in the two years he was on the lot, and left in cold fury.

"I was bitter and vengeful," he recalled, swinging his glasses in one well-kept hand. But you can't get anywhere with a chip on your shoulder.

"Life's a two-way pocket. You can't put your hand full of money into your pocket, take it out empty every time, and still expect to get much out of living. And you certainly can't take it out with a knife in it! Until I learned that, I bounced around from studio to studio, doing serials, small parts, any old thing. I was with Paramount until they gave me one line in 'Wake Island', then I quit."

In those years, he had some fine parts in pictures that didn't click. He got rave reviews as lead in "Parson of Panamint," but that led nowhere because producer Harry Sherman was associated with Westerns and no one took the picture very seriously. Life was a series of heartbreaks.

But while he was doing a serial at Republic Studios, Phil met Director John Auer. Mr. Auer promised nothing, but when he was casting "Music in Manhattan" he thumbed through a film directory for possibilities, and saw Phil's photograph. The director shook his head and turned the page. But next time he leafed through and saw Phil, he sent for him. It was this role that set the bells ringing.

"All an actor has to sell is his ego," observed Phil. "If you are to make the grade, you can't go on a set thinking: 'Gee, if Cary Grant or Gary Cooper had this part they'd be wonderful!' You must convince yourself you can play it better than any other actor. But you can't take yourself so seriously that you believe the stuff written about you.

"If a man is honest with himself, he knows there are dozens of talented people hanging around casting offices who could do what he does—maybe even better—if given a chance. They don't get the breaks. Talent isn't essential for success in pictures; great personalities have succeeded who had no talent to start with—they acquired a facile technique as they went on, and the public loves them."

A successful career has no chance of turning young Mr. Terry's level head.

He's six-feet-one, has crisp brown hair and thoughtful brown eyes; he knows how to wear clothes, but is not particularly interested in them. His idea of a wonderful evening is to stay home and listen to music with Joan. . . . Most subjects mentioned lead back to Joan.

"I never thought one way or the other about love at first sight, until the night I met Joan," he confessed, sitting Turk-fashion in his chair, his face bright with the memory. "I'd seen her on the screen often and hadn't imagined knowing her. She's so different, anyway, from her screen self. Harry Mines, a newspaperman I've known for years, several times suggested that I go with him to Joan's house, but something always happened and we didn't go. Then one night we were dining together, when Harry mentioned that he was calling on Joan later. If I liked, he'd ask her if I could come. She said yes and we went.

"I think I knew I was in love as soon as I saw her coming toward me. We'd been on the same lot for two years, and once even worked in the same picture, without meeting."

They were married July 21, 1942, not long after that first meeting, and have since adopted two children.

He's mad about the children and will tell you stories about them for hours, if there's time. Joan, though, as a topic of conversation, has an easy lead. Joan has helped him so much. Joan packs his lunch every day because his nervous digestion makes eating in his dressing room imperative. She joins him there, if she's not working. They talk everything over, never have enough time for all they have to say, yet they can slip into long unbroken silences during musical evenings at home.

"I'm happy," he reiterated, "and I put nothing ahead of my happiness. I won't work after six o'clock because I want to get home in time to enjoy my family. I turn down all offers that mean leaving home—I even turned down 'Voice of the Turtle' when they asked me to do the Chicago run, and that was a real temptation.

"You have to make up your mind what's precious to you and then let nothing swerve you from it, if you want success."
